Glory, and honor, and power, and might, and dominion be unto Thee, O God, Ruler Supreme! We thank Thee for the distinguished blessings of Thy providence which have been conferred upon us; for the abundant harvests that have been garnered all over our land; for health prevailing in our borders, restraining the hand of the destroying angel from raining down pestilence and plague upon our cities and our coasts; and for carrying our country safely through another exciting ordeal at the ballot-box; and that we have peace!

We thank Thee, also, for the blessings of the Gospel; for a throne of grace, which is ever accessible; for an open Bible, the charter of liberty and the word of Life; and for the preaching of the glorious Gospel of the ever-blessed God, with none to molest or make us afraid.

We thank Thee that Thy servants, the Senators and members of the House of Representatives, have been protected and preserved in their life and health, and now, by the ordering of Thy good providence, have been convened to answer to the roll-call of their country. O Lord, we pray that they may bring clear minds and true hearts to the great questions that may come before them for consideration, and that they may be eminently endowed with wisdom from on high, so that the conclusions they reach, and the enactments they make, may be such as to secure the approval of God and the acquiescence of the people.

We pray, O Lord, that thou wilt grant that the affecting dispensations of Thy providence and the public bereavements experienced during the recess may be sanctified to the good of us all, and we ask that though the workmen die the work may go on; though men die God lives; and may Thy servants remember that however high in official station they may be man is mortal and death is no respecter of persons.

We ask that Thy blessing may rest upon us in all of our interests and relations to each other and to the Government and to the world. Grant, we pray Thee, to bless the President of the United States and his constitutional advisers. May they so execute the laws of the land that peace and quiet and order may ensue.

And now we ask that the divine benediction may descend upon all of our institutions and interests as a people and a nation, and that God will guide and direct all the affairs appertaining to this great people, that they may be ordered in wisdom and in goodness, so as to secure the welfare of the nation and promote the glory of God.

Hear our prayer, forgive our sins, accept our persons and our service; and when we have accomplished our work, and fulfilled our mission here upon the earth, save us with an everlasting salvation, through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

ORGANIZATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time for the assembling of the third session of the Fortieth Congress having arrived, the Senate will please come to order.

On motion of Mr. MORGAN, it was Ordered, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate has assembled, and that the Senate is ready to proceed to business.

HOOR OF MEETING.

On motion of Mr. ANTHONY, it was Ordered, That the hour of the daily meeting of the Senate be twelve o'clock meridian until otherwise ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that a quorum of the House had assembled and was ready to proceed to business.

The message also announced that the House had appointed Mr. E. B. WASHBURN of Illinois, Mr. J. A. GARFIELD of Ohio, and Mr. JAMES BROOKS of New York, a committee to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of the Senate to wait on the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of the two Houses is in session and ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. DIXON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That a committee consisting of two members be appointed, to join such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives, to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of each House has assembled, and that Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore being authorized to appoint the committee, Messrs. DIXON and HENDRICKS were appointed.

CREDENTIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the credentials of Hon. GEORGE F. EDMUNDS, elected by the Legislature of Vermont a Senator from that State for the term of six years, beginning March 4, 1869; which were read, and ordered to be filed.

SENATOR FROM GEORGIA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will also lay before the Senate a communication from the Governor of Georgia.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President—

Mr. SUMNER. What is the communication?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A communication from the Governor of Georgia on the relations of that State to the General Government. I have had no time to read it, and hardly know what it is. It will be read if there be no objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that it lie on the table for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will lie on the table if there be no objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present the credentials of Hon. JOSHUA HILL as a Senator from the State of Georgia. I ask that they may be read and the oath administered.

The Secretary read the following credentials: STATE OF GEORGIA.

By his Excellency RUFUS B. BULLOCK,
Governor of said State:

To Hon. JOSHUA HILL, greeting:

Whereas by the third section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States of America it is ordered and established that the Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof for the term of six years:

And whereas the General Assembly of the State of Georgia did, vis voce vote thereof, on the 23th day of July, 1868, elect you, the said Joshua Hill, to be one of the Senators from this State in the Congress of the United States, to serve the unexpired term ending 4th of March, 1873:

These are, therefore, to authorize and commission you, the said Joshua Hill, to take session in the Senate of the United States, forthwith, to use and exercise all and every the privilege and powers which you may or can do by virtue of the said commission in behalf of this State.

Given under my hand and the great seal of the State, at the capitol, in the city of Atlanta, this 10th day of September, in the year of our Lord 1868, and of the independence of the United States of America the ninety-third.

[L. s.] RUFUS B. BULLOCK, Governor.

By the Governor: DAVID G. COTTING,
Secretary of State.

Mr. DRAKE. Mr. President, I move that the credentials of the Senator-elect from Georgia be laid upon the table for the present, until the committees of the Senate are organized.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the Senator will withdraw the motion to lay on the table, which perhaps is not debatable, and I will make a statement in regard to this matter. If the motion to lay on the table is insisted upon, I suppose it is not debatable.

Mr. DRAKE. I will state, Mr. President, that I made the motion to lay on the table on the supposition that the committees of the Senate were not in existence at this time; but gentlemen around me say that they are in existence until changed, and therefore I withdraw the motion to lay upon the table.

Mr. TRUMBULL. They are not in existence.

Mr. DRAKE. Now, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, the Senator from Illinois, says I was right originally, that the committees are not in existence. I do not know which is right; but there are those who know much better than I do. But, sir, I withdraw for the present the motion to lay upon the table.

I state now that I do not think that the Senator-elect from Georgia should be sworn in and allowed to take his seat in the Senate at this time. A very grave question comes up in connection with the reconstruction of the government of the State of Georgia, a question which in my opinion the Senate of the United States is bound to take notice of, bound to investigate, bound to pass upon. If I understand the position of matters correctly, after a loyal Legislature had been elected in that State under the reconstruction act of Congress, the white men of the Legislature combined and expelled from their seats all the colored members of the Legislature, thereby placing that body under rebel control. If this be true, then I claim that we should not recognize the reconstruction of Georgia as complete. Therefore, sir, I move that the credentials of the Senator-elect from Georgia be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President—
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair

will state that by his understanding of the rules of the Senate there are no committees at this time.

Mr. WILSON, (to Mr. DRAKE.) Withdraw your motion. Let the Senator from Ohio make his statement, and renew it afterward.

Mr. DRAKE. I have withdrawn the motion to lay upon the table.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust the unusual course of referring the credentials of a Senator-elect will not be adopted unless for good reason. If there is any objection to the person-elect for want of loyalty or for any other reason, there is no objection by me or by any one to a reference. But no ground has been laid for a reference. It is unusual unless some allegation is made affecting the status of the State or affecting the status of the person. Now, a few facts and a few dates are all that it is necessary to state in regard to this matter.

There can be no objection to the person, because Hon. Joshua Hill is well known to have been a Union man throughout the war, to be now able to take the oath, and to be one of the very few of those living in the South through the war who were not forced or who were not willingly in a condition to give aid to the rebels in arms. He is now prepared to take the oath of office, having been faithful and true during the whole war, and having been duly elected by the Legislature of the State of Georgia.

Now, a word in regard to the condition of the State of Georgia. Georgia has been recognized by this Senate and by the House of Representatives as a State in the Union, having complied with the reconstruction laws, having adopted the constitutional amendment, and her compliance with the reconstruction acts having been approved and sanctioned both by the Senate and House. It seems that on the 18th day of July, 1868, the Governor was inaugurated. On the 20th of July, 1868, members of the House of Representatives from the State of Georgia, elected according to our acts, presented themselves at the bar of the House of Representatives and were admitted and sworn into office, and now sit there as members of the House. On the 28th of July, 1868, as is shown by the record here, Mr. Hill was elected Senator from the State of Georgia. That was at a time when all the members of the Legislature were in their seats before the question as to the eligibility of certain members arose in the Legislature at all. He was elected by a very large majority of all, including those who have since been ejected. Subsequently to that time a portion of the members of the Legislature were ejected from the senate and house of the State of Georgia. This conduct of the majority is as much disapproved by the Senator-elect as by any one of us. It was a gross outrage; a violation, in my judgment, of the constitutional amendment, and a violation of the reconstruction acts. It is an outrage which ought to be corrected; but it seems to me it would be very hard indeed to make a gentleman duly elected by the whole Legislature, and a Union man, entitled to his seat here, who disapproves the action of the Legislature, suffer for conduct which he does not approve, and which he hopes, by having a seat here among us, to be able in part to correct.

This is the view which is presented to me, and I trust, therefore, the Senator from Missouri will not press this question. If this case goes to the Judiciary Committee, it leaves this gentleman in suspense on a reference to the committee, when there is no ground for such a reference. In my judgment we ought never to make such a reference unless facts are stated, on the responsibility of a member, which are sufficient to exclude the Senator-elect from his seat. Now, if the fact as stated by the Senator from Missouri be admitted, it lays no ground whatever for the exclusion of the Senator-elect from the State of Georgia, because that fact transpired days after he was duly elected by the whole Legislature; after he received his certificate of election from the Governor of that State, when his right to his seat here was complete; after his colleagues in the other House had taken their seats. That action of the Legislature is disapproved by him, and he hopes by having a seat in the Senate to be able, in some degree, to correct it. That will be one of the first acts of his senatorial service. He believes that duty to the people of the State of Georgia requires him to endeavor to correct, so far as possible, that gross outrage of the majority of the Legislature of Georgia. I trust, therefore, that the Senator-elect will be allowed to take the usual oath and enter upon the discharge of his duties.

Mr. DRAKE. Mr. President, the question that is involved in the matter now before us is whether the power of the Senate over a reconstructed rebel State ends with the moment that that State may have been recognized in one or the other House of Congress as being a State restored to her position in the Union. I contend not, sir; else it would be in the power of any one of those States, the day or the moment after it had been recognized as a State in the Union, again to undo everything that it had done, to place itself in a condition of quasi revolt against the authority of the General Government again, and to restore the power of rebels there, and still Congress be utterly unable to do anything for the protection of the loyal men of the State. I do not believe in any such doctrine. I intend to resist any such doctrine in the Senate. I hold, sir, that Congress has a continuing and undiminished power over those States, to preserve what was built up there in their reconstruction, and I do not intend to vote for the admission of any Senator from any one of those States that has attempted to undo the ascendancy there of loyal men and put rebels there into the ascendancy.

It is for this reason that I object to the State of Georgia being now represented upon this floor. Of course I can have no personal objection to the honorable gentleman who is the Senator-elect from that State. I have no doubt that all that has been said of him by the Senator from Ohio is perfectly true. But the question is not a personal one. The question is as to the supremacy of the Congress of the United States over the reconstruction of the rebel States, the power of Congress to secure loyal ascendancy in those States and to put down rebel ascendancy, the continuing power, not the power ended when we passed the laws we did here at the last session, but the power abiding to secure the results which we then attempted to establish.

I wish this matter to be investigated. I wish the facts to go before the country. I wish that we should know what ground we are going upon in giving a seat here to a Senator from a State that has thrown off loyal supremacy in its Legislature, by banishing from its halls of legislation the colored men who were elected by the people and admitting white rebels to hold that State in subjection to rebel dictation and control. That is my object, sir. I state it frankly. If it be the will of the Senate that this matter shall have no attention at all at this time, but that the Senator-elect from Georgia shall be admitted, of course I bow with respect and submission to their decision; but it cannot be done with my vote.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. President, it seems to me that the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Ohio have not touched the primary ground on which objection should be made to the admission of these Senators. As I understand the case the reconstruction laws have not been complied with. The prior ground of objection is that a portion of the members of that Legislature were expressly disqualified by the reconstruction laws, and therefore were not legal members of that Legislature. In connection with this subject, I ask for the reading to the Senate of the communication from the Governor of Georgia which has been received this morning and laid on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the paper will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

Having, as provisional governor-elect, under the reconstruction acts, been authorized by an act to admit the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, Alabama, and Florida to representation in Congress, which act became a law June 25, 1868, to convene the provisional Legislature of Georgia; and having by proclamation, under date June 25, 1868, acted upon that authority; and having, on the fourth day of July, 1868, been appointed provisional governor of Georgia by Major General George G. Meade, commanding the third military district, under and by virtue of the power vested in him by the reconstruction acts, I deem it my official duty to represent to your honorable body that the laws under which the State of Georgia was to have been admitted to representation in Congress have not been fully executed, and to present for your consideration the reasons which lead me to this conclusion.

By section six of an act for the more efficient government of the rebel States, among which States is enumerated the State of Georgia, it is provided that "until the people of said rebellious States shall be by law admitted to representation in Congress, any civil government which may exist therein shall be deemed provisional only." The government of the State has therefore been, and must continue to be, provisional until the conditions required by the act which became a law June 25, 1868, shall have been complied with by a Legislature organized in accordance with the reconstruction acts previously adopted.

By section ten of the supplementary reconstruction act passed July 19, 1867, it is required that "all persons hereafter elected" * * * "to office in said military districts" * * * "shall be required to take and subscribe the oath of office prescribed by law for officers of the United States."

The government having been provisional at the time of the assembling of the Legislature referred to, the law therefore required that such persons only as were eligible under the reconstruction acts should be permitted to participate in the necessary provisional legislation precedent to recognition as a State. The fact, however, is that all the candidates for the General Assembly who had received the highest number of votes were, without regard to their eligibility under the law, permitted to take seats in the provisional legislative body, and to participate in the organization and the legislation thereof, having first been simply invited to take an oath prescribed in the new constitution, which constitution had not at that time become, and under the law could not then be, of force.

The result of this failure to execute the law has been a defeat of the purposes which Congress had in view when passing the acts, these purposes having been the establishment of a loyal and republican State government affording adequate protection for life and property, the maintenance of peace and good order, and the free expression of political opinion.

The wise discernment displayed by Congress, in requiring by its legislation that none but those who were loyal should participate in the establishment of a provisional government which was thereafter to be clothed with the rights and immunities of a State in the Union, charged with the care and protection of the lives and property and the civil and political rights of its citizens, is made the more apparent by the consequences which have ensued from this failure in the enforcement of that legislation.

I would, therefore, respectfully invite the attention of your honorable body to this subject, and ask that such steps be taken as may to you seem wise and proper for the obtaining of full information in relation thereto, and to the end that loyalty may be protected and promoted by the enforcement of the laws enacted by the Representatives of the American people.

RUFUS B. BULLOCK.

By the Governor: EUGENE DAVIS, Executive Secretary.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the communication of Governor Bullock does not really raise any question as to the eligibility of Mr. Hill. The Senator-elect appears here with a commission issued by Governor Bullock in the ordinary form, showing his election by the Legislature; and he was elected before any of the questions arose about which this controversy occurs. Senators ought to remember the dates. Mr. Hill was unquestionably elected by a majority of all the members of the Legislature when every one claiming a seat was present and no one was excluded from among those elected. They took the oath prescribed by the constitution of the State. Congress had previously sanctioned the constitution of the State of Georgia by a joint resolution which was passed at the closing period of the session in July. So that every act, every condition, every qualification, every restriction imposed and demanded by Congress was complied with by the Legislature of Georgia until after they elected Senators of the United States. Then it was that the controversy arose as to the right of the colored senators and members of that Legislature to hold their seats. Then it was that in violation of the constitution of the State of Georgia, in violation of the amendment to the Constitution of the United States, the majority of that Legislature excluded from their body a portion of the senators and representatives; but this conduct was subsequent to the complete election of the Senator-elect. As I am authorized to say by him, for he is not allowed to speak for himself, he disapproves of this highly, and hopes through the powers conferred by the constitutional amendment itself to be able to prescribe a remedy that will not only prevent Georgia but any other State from adopting a like course in violation of the constitutional amendment. I trust, therefore, that the Senator under the circumstances will be allowed to take the oath of office, and that if any question be made his credentials may be referred afterwards. That is the usual course.

I have said that the members of the Legislature elected took the oath of office prescribed by the constitution of the State. Whether they committed perjury or not is hardly proper for us in the Senate to examine or inquire into. Certainly it would be a very extraordinary thing for the Senate to inquire into the action of members of the State Legislature in that respect, especially when all who were elected and claimed to be elected were sworn into office, and when a controversy as to the eligibility of three or four Senators or members would not have affected this election in the least.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I desire to present and have read to the Senate a memorial of a convention of the colored citizens of Georgia assembled in that State at Macon, on the 6th, 7th, and 8th of October, which is signed by Mr. H. M. Turner, the president of the convention, and James Porter, secretary, and is submitted by a committee appointed by the convention, consisting of James M. Simms, Henry M. Turner, and John T. Costin. I ask that this memorial be received and read for the information of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorial will be read if there be no objection?

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

A memorial addressed to the Congress of the United States of America in behalf of the colored population of the State of Georgia by their representatives assembled in convention at Macon, October 6, 7, and 8, A. D. 1868:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

We, the representatives of nearly one hundred thousand of the legal voters of the State of Georgia, and nearly five hundred thousand inhabitants thereof, assembled in a convention called to consider our condition as a people in view of the late action of the General Assembly of said State, in expelling therefrom twenty-nine colored members of that body who had been duly elected to their seats by legal majorities of their respective districts and counties, and after taking the same into due and solemn consideration, beg leave most humbly and respectfully to submit this our memorial to your honorable body:

Your memorialists beg leave most respectfully to show that the colored members of the Legislature of this State were not expelled therefrom for any fault of theirs, for any illegality or fraud in their election, or for any alleged incompetency according to the constitution and laws, but solely on the ground that they were free persons of color, and as such not eligible to their seats.

Your memorialists would further show that their expulsion for the cause alleged is utterly repugnant to the constitution and laws of this State, inconsistent with the whole series of acts under which the State has been permitted to resume her place in the Federal Union, subversive of all the rights which have been guaranteed to us under the Constitution and laws of the United States, and of this State, and so revolutionary in its character as to demand additional legislation on the part of Congress in order to maintain the integrity of the reconstructed State government, and save our race from oppression and ruin.

First. It is utterly repugnant to the constitution and laws of this State.

1. The words "white" and "colored" do not occur in the new constitution of the State of Georgia. The instrument was framed with cautious reference to this subject of race and color so as to avoid any distinctions on that ground and secure equal civil and political rights to all classes of persons accordingly.

2. The convention which framed the constitution defined the term "citizens" in the following manner: "All persons born or naturalized in the United States and resident in this State are hereby declared citizens of this State." (Art. I, sec. 2.)

3. The rights of such are guaranteed in the following clauses:

"And no laws shall be made or enforced which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, or of this State, or deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of its laws." (Art. I, sec. 2.)

We hold that the expulsion of any member of the Legislature duly elected, and otherwise properly qualified, solely on the ground of race or color, is an abridgment of the privileges and immunities of the citizen.

4. The Legislature is bound to go further and enact adequate laws for our protection:

"And it shall be the duty of the General Assembly, by appropriate legislation, to protect every person in the due enjoyment of the rights, privileges, and immunities guaranteed in this section." (Art. I, sec. 2.)

This section did not constitute us citizens of the United States. We were made such by the "civil rights bill" passed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress. But as soon as our new constitution was ratified and the General Assembly adopted the constitutional amendment known as the fourteenth article, we became citizens of the State of Georgia, and as such entitled to the same "rights," privileges, and immunities belonging to other citizens, for the constitution makes no difference on the score of color.

5. The electoral right is expressed as follows:

"Every male person born in the United States, and every male person who has been naturalized or who has legally declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States, twenty-one years or upwards, who shall have resided in this State six months preceding the election, and shall have resided thirty days in the county in which he offers to vote, and shall have paid all taxes which may have been required of him, and which he may have had an opportunity of paying agreeably to law for the year next preceding the election (except as hereinafter provided) shall be deemed an elector; and every male citizen of the United States, of the age aforesaid, (except as hereinafter provided,) who may be resident of the State at the time of the adoption of this constitution, shall be deemed an elector as aforesaid." (Art. II, Sec. 2.)

The exceptions provided for in the article relate to soldiers and sailors in the military and naval service of the United States who may be stationed on duty in this State, to persons convicted of certain offenses, and to idiots and insane persons. No one is disqualified on the ground of race, color, or previous condition.

6. The same may be said of the members of the General Assembly. They are not ineligible on account of race, color, or previous condition. They are required, in the case of senators, to be twenty-five years of age, citizens of the United States; and after the first election under the new constitution citizens of this State for two years, and of the districts from which elected one year; and in the case of Representatives twenty-one years of age, who, after the first election, must be citizens of the State one year, and for six months residents of the counties from which elected. (See art. III, sec. 2, par. 2. Also, sec. 3 and par. 3.)

7. Neither senators nor representatives were required to be citizens of this State at the first election, for it was supposed the colored voters were not citizens of Georgia at that time, that they could not be citizens of the State until the constitution which made them such was adopted. It became necessary, therefore, to provide for their eligibility to membership in the first General Assembly held under the new constitution. This was done in an ordinance adopted by the convention. That ordinance provided that the members should be "inhabitants" of the State six months, and of the district and counties from which elected three months. The word "inhabitants" was used purposely instead of "citizens." When the resolution instructing the Committee on the Judiciary to bring in the ordinance was under discussion a motion was made to strike out "inhabitants" and insert "citizens," but the motion was lost by a vote of forty-four for and sixty-three against it. (See Journal of the convention, pp. 331, 383, 473.)

8. The eleventh article of the constitution adopted, as a part of the general laws in force in this State, the new code called "Irwin's code." This code contains the following definition of the rights of citizens:

"Sec. 1648. Among the rights of citizens are the enjoyment of personal security, of personal liberty, private property and the disposition thereof, the elective franchise, the right to hold office, to appeal to the courts, to testify as a witness, to perform any civil function, and to keep and bear arms."

"Sec. 1649. All citizens are entitled to exercise all their rights as such unless specially prohibited by law."

The laws prohibit persons who may be convicted of certain offenses, and insane persons and idiots, from holding office or performing any civil function; but they do not prohibit any one on account of his color. All laws which are inconsistent with the new constitution are repealed in the eleventh article.

These references to the different parts of the new constitution and to the laws now in force in this State are sufficient, we trust, to satisfy your honorable body that the expulsion of the colored members was entirely repugnant to our constitution and laws.

Second. It is inconsistent with the entire series of acts under the operation of which the State has been permitted to resume her place in the national Union.

The colored men of this State did not at first aspire to political positions. They were content with the liberty which God, a beneficent Government, and a loyal Army had bestowed upon them, and with the protection to person and property which had been guaranteed them in the civil rights bill. Depressed by long continued servitude and degraded by ignorance, they knew they were not in the aggregate fitted for official stations; but their former owners were obstinate, resisting every movement which tended to the elevation and improvement of our race, opposing the establishment of schools for our benefit, and rejecting all the plans of restoration proposed by a loyal Congress. Major General John Pope, who was appointed to the command of the third military district and intrusted with the duty of executing the reconstruction laws therein, appointed one colored with two white registrars for each senatorial district in the State. He thereby gave practical force to the idea that under the reconstruction acts of Congress colored persons were entitled to hold office. Accordingly, about thirty-six colored men became candidates and were elected as delegates to the constitutional convention. They did so with the full knowledge and implied consent of the commanding general and his superintendent of registration, and when elected they were officially notified from headquarters of their election and of the time and place for the assembling of the convention. They obeyed the official summons, were allowed to take their seats, and did assist in framing the constitution. When that constitution was submitted to the people for ratification a number of colored men became candidates for the Legislature and various civil offices at the election provided for by it, and twenty-nine were accordingly elected by legal majorities to the house of representatives, and three to the senate.

At both elections they desired to run white persons for office; but in some counties they could not find such as they could trust as faithful representatives of their views and interests. Besides, they were persuaded to offer themselves as candidates by many white men who were opposed to the convention and to the ratification of the constitution on the ground, ostensibly, that they were preferred to white Union men. Pending the canvass for the ratification all of our political opponents spoke and voted against the constitution, because, as they contended, it gave colored persons the right to hold office. On this ground they made earnest efforts to defeat the constitution in all those counties embraced in what is called "the white belt," that is, wherever the number of white voters was largely in excess of the colored. Such was the course taken then by the very men who in the Legislature argued that colored persons are ineligible to office under our constitution. The colored members-elect were duly notified by a general order from the headquarters of Major General Meade, and summoned by the proclamation of the Governor-elect, who had been appointed provisional governor, to meet in the city of Atlanta on the 4th of July, 1868. They obeyed the summons, and were duly qualified by Judge Erskine, of the United States court, in the presence of the Governor-elect, General Meade, the superintendent of registration, and those members who afterward voted to exclude them. They were admitted to their seats under these circumstances, no one objecting on account of their color, and no one ever questioning their right to be seated.

Shortly after the organization of the General Assembly as a provisional legislature, the provisional governor transmitted to both houses a communication from General Meade, in which he declared that he would recognize no act of the Legislature as valid, or allow the same to be executed, until all persons excluded by the fourteenth article were deprived of their seats or offices in both houses. Each house appointed a committee to investigate the eligibility of members according to this requisition, and more than a week was spent in that investigation. The result was the adoption by each house of resolutions declaring all the members eligible to their seats. The following is the resolution adopted by the house of representatives:

"Whereas under the instruction of the general commanding this military district, communicated to this house by his excellency the provisional governor, the house proceeded to examine into and investigate the question of the eligibility of its members under the reconstruction acts of Congress, and, after a full and thorough investigation thereof, have found all persons occupying seats eligible thereto:

Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed by the speaker to wait upon his excellency and notify him of the result of said investigation."

This resolution expressly declared "all members occupying seats eligible thereto," and General Meade thereupon recognized the General Assembly as legally organized. In all these and subsequent proceedings, until the 3d day of September following, the colored members participated without any one questioning their right to do so. The constitutional amendment was adopted, United States Senators and State house officers elected, and many other acts performed by the body, all of which must be invalid, unless the colored members, through whose votes many of these measures were adopted, were entitled to the seats which they were allowed to hold. As nearly all the members who were opposed to us politically, who opposed the calling of the constitutional convention and the ratification of the constitution framed by it, who have persistently opposed the whole policy of reconstruction adopted by Congress, voted against the adoption of the fourteenth article, that measure could not have been carried by the Legislature of Georgia without the votes of the colored members of that body. It is therefore for your honorable body to determine whether it was legally adopted, if the colored members were ineligible; or, if eligible, whether they should be restored to their seats, notwithstanding the act of the enemies of reconstruction? If the colored members were eligible for one purpose, were they not eligible for all purposes of legitimate legislation? Their opponents were seemingly willing, very willing, that the constitutional amendment should be adopted; but they left it to the friends of reconstruction to adopt it. They were unwilling, after their stubborn resistance to it, to put themselves upon the record in favor of it; but they saw ahead of them a time when they meant to take advantage of the power which it would give them; a time when the State would be free from military government; when it would no longer be subject to the interference of Congress; a time, in short, when they might do as they pleased in spite of constitutional restrictions. Will your honorable body suffer them to reap those advantages now at our expense—advantages which they have gained by the practice of a deception unparalleled in the history of legislation in this country? The expulsion of the colored members was inconsistent with the acts of reconstruction, inconsistent with the acts of the military in enforcing the laws of Congress, and inconsistent with the acts of the Legislature in settling the question of the eligibility of its members, organizing the government permanently, and electing the various officers of the government and United States Senators.

Third. It is subversive of all the rights conferred upon us by the Constitution and laws of the United States and of this State.

By this act of the General Assembly nearly one half of the inhabitants of this State are denied the right of representation. We are required to pay our proportion of the taxes necessary to support the Government, but can have no voice in that Government. We can take no part in shaping the policy nor in the making or enforcing of the laws which involve the happiness, if not the very existence, of half a million of our race. All these vast interests are to be henceforth entirely in the hands of those who held us as chattels, who made merchandise of us, who kept us in profound ignorance, and forbade by civil law the development of our manhood, and whose education and hereditary prejudices of caste incline them to regard us as having "no rights that a white man is bound to respect." Their bitter opposition to the reconstruction acts was caused by their invincible hatred of political equality among the races, and especially the enfranchisement of ours. It is certain, therefore, that with the power in their hands to go on without rebuke, without a sense of responsibility to some power which they know they must respect, they will continue their aggressions upon our rights until they have stripped us of our right to vote, and reduce us to a state of degradation and misery, little if any better than that slavery from which we have been delivered.

This spirit toward us has been manifested by the present Legislature in many ways, particularly in refusing to let the excluded members have their protest recorded upon the journal of the house, and in utter violation of the spirit of our constitution, refusing to allow our people to sit on juries, even when their dearest rights are involved. In fact, when they expelled the colored members they exhibited that arbitrary temper which smote down the whole fabric of our constitutional rights at a single blow. We had no redress. There was no power on earth to which we could appeal for help, with the hope of any degree of success, but to your honorable body. In vain did our representatives argue the principles of our constitution. In vain did they appeal to the sympathies, the generosity, the sense of justice of our oppressors. In vain did they appeal to their consciences, and beseech them to desist from their mad attempt to destroy a constitution which they had sworn to support. They had the power, for when the charge of ineligibility was presented the Speaker ruled that none of the persons involved in the charge had the right to vote upon the question, and they were all expelled in a body from the House. They were expelled not because they had no rights under the constitution, not because they had committed any offense against the State, the laws, or the good order of the body, but because they were "free persons of color." Their color disqualified them. No virtue, no patriotism, no degree of intelligence, no constitutional guaranties could avail to check the deep-rooted prejudice of caste, the inveterate hatred of our race, or save our representatives from the vengeance of their oppressors in the hour of their weakness and distress. We must submit to law as enacted and enforced by those who, though they might love us as their property, as they love their sheep and oxen, hate us as freemen. They must be our legislators, our judges, our jurors, and, in spite of our constitution, in spite of all that a loyal Congress has done for us, they must be our masters. Life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness may be guaranteed to all by fundamental laws, but practically they are of no value to us or our children.

The temper displayed by the members of the Legislature who were opposed to us and our rights is that which pervades the whole mass of society, except a comparatively few loyal whites. The class opposed to us do not favor our education or improvement in any particular. They have founded no schools for us, erected no school-houses, given and supported no teachers for our benefit; but they have persecuted and ostracised the teachers sent to us from the sympathizing northern friends and those native teachers who have been employed by the Government or by benevolent societies. They have, in many instances, burnt our school-houses and churches and driven our teachers away from hotels and respectable boarding-houses. They have heaped all manner of reproaches, abuse, and slanders upon all who have befriended us or who have endeavored to improve our condition, and especially those who have been friendly to our political advancement. Their leaders have, in some instances, recommended the slaughter of leading white men who favor our cause, and many of our kindred have been murdered for the part they have taken in political affairs, as well as for trifling causes of any other character. Bodies of armed men hostile to our rights have assailed and dispersed assemblies of our colored citizens who peaceably met for the decision of political questions, murdering, in some instances, not a few of them in a most brutal manner. The act of the Legislature tends, therefore, to subvert all the rights which we have under the laws of our country.

Fourth. Hence our only hope of deliverance is in Congress.

The State is indebted to us for its restoration. There were nearly eighty thousand colored and less than forty thousand whites who voted for a convention, and the relative numbers voting for the ratification of the constitution were about the same. Without the colored votes, the fourteenth article would not have been adopted, and the State would still be under the disabilities which involved it when the confederate armies surrendered. We feel that as we were thus instrumental in saving or attempting to save it from the anarchy into which the rebellion plunged it, we ought to have our full share in the administration of its future government. This is all we claim. We could ask for nothing less. We ask that no disabilities be imposed on our opponents except such as in your judgment are necessary to secure our rights, our constitution, and the welfare of both races. Confiding in your sense of justice, in the generous policy which gave us our liberty and invested us with political rights, we commit ourselves, our lives, our liberties, and all we hold most dear on earth, with the interests of the hundreds of thousands whom we represent and their unborn posterity into the hands of your august body, and humbly pray that this our petition may move your hearts and this great American nation to grant unto us and our children all the rights, privileges, and immunities set forth in the Declaration of Independence and in the Constitution and laws of the United States and the State of Georgia.

For we are satisfied that our oppressors, whom we have faithfully served for two hundred and fifty years, have combined for the avowed purpose of exterminating our race in America for no fault of our own, but for being loyal to our country in war and obedient to her laws in peace. Had we arrayed ourselves against the laws of the land and with them defied the Government, then it might have been better with us to-day. Thus we have borne more than any people ever did in the history of nations, not because we could not have repeatedly retaliated in a measure, but because we desired to keep peace and harmony in this our country which we love. And now we again appeal to your august body to know whether we shall look to you in the future for justice and protection, or must we protect ourselves?

True extract from the minutes of the convention:
H. M. TURNER, President.

Most respectfully submitted by the undersigned, a committee delegated to present the same to the Congress of the United States.

JAMES M. SIMMS,
HENRY M. TURNER,
JOHN T. COSTIN.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Shall the Senator-elect from Georgia be permitted to take the oath with a view to his admission to his seat in the Senate? That is the question.

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not object to the reading of that paper, because I thought, as it bore upon the condition of affairs in Georgia, it was right enough to place it on the record; but it not only does not conflict with the right of Mr. Hill to be sworn, but it rather, if Senators will consider the question, shows his right. All the matters that have been complained of by the excluded members of the Legislature occurred after Mr. Hill was elected; and I may further say that it is the desire of the Senator-elect to participate with us in protecting these very people in the enjoyment of their clear right to hold office in the State of Georgia and throughout the United States, when they are duly elected by the qualified electors of a State. It is, therefore, rather hard to read this memorial and file it upon this application to be sworn in by Mr. Hill when really his desire is to secure these people against the very indictments which have been put upon them by the majority of the Legislature of Georgia.

But I rose mainly to ask the Secretary to read, as bearing upon this question, a portion of the report of General Meade. It has not been communicated to us officially, but it is published in the journals, and it shows precisely the mode and manner in which this question arose. I may state, in brief, that the very question of the power of General Meade to pass upon the eligibility of the members of the Legislature was presented to him and he applied to the War Department for instructions and the War Department telegraphed him, substantially, that he had no power to pass upon the eligibility of members. The Secretary of War, then the General-in-Chief of the Army, consulted the Reconstruction Committee, or a portion of them, and I have here in General Meade's report a telegram signed by Mr. WILSON, Chairman of the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives, and also by Messrs. BOUTWELL, FARNSWORTH, and

PAYNE, of the Reconstruction Committee of the House, in which they state what I think is the law:

WASHINGTON, June 30, 1868.

To Governor WARMOTH, New Orleans:

We think that persons disqualified under the fourteenth article of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States are not eligible to your Legislature. This is to be determined by the respective Houses, and no oath can be imposed except the oath prescribed by the State constitution.

In precise conformity to this dispatch General Meade declined to pass upon the eligibility of members, there being two or three, as I understand, perhaps more, in each house of the Legislature of Georgia as to whom there was some doubt as to their ability to take the test-oath. The question arose as to whether General Meade had power to exclude them by withholding from them their certificates of election. In pursuance of the decision made by the Secretary of War, and in compliance with this telegram, and in compliance with the law, I think, he refused to act on the subject, and referred it to the Legislature. There was no objection made to the eligibility of either a Senator or member prior to the election of Mr. Hill. All the members elected to the Legislature contributed to that election, those who were ineligible probably voting against Mr. Hill, so that he received a majority of all the persons elected to that Legislature, including or excluding those who were claimed to be ineligible on account of incapacity to take the oath of office. These members did take the oath prescribed by the constitution of Georgia, and were, upon taking that oath, admitted to their seats. In justice to Mr. Hill, I will ask that a portion of the report of General Meade be read and placed on the record; and after that is done, after a conference with the Senator-elect, and with his consent, I am perfectly willing that this matter shall lie over for a day or two to allow Senators to look into it. I hope that then there will be no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The document will be read if there be no objection. None being made, it will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

"The convention in Georgia, after being in session several months, in March adopted a constitution which, together with a State ticket, was submitted to the people in April, and ratified by a very handsome majority of the registered vote, all parties taking part in the election. This constitution, with some modifications, was adopted by Congress, and the Legislature which convened in July making these modifications and otherwise complying with the requirements of the reconstruction law, the State, together with Alabama and Florida, were, by act of Congress, formally admitted to representation. There is one point in regard to the admission of the State of Georgia to which I feel called upon to make special allusion. When the Legislature was convened by the provisional governor and Governor-elect, the question arose whether, as military commander, I was called to inquire into the eligibility of the members, either under the United States laws or the constitution of Georgia. The convention of Georgia has in its ordinance calling an election directed that all returns should be sent to the military commander of the district, who was requested to issue the necessary certificates of election. In carrying out this request of the convention I deemed my duty simply required that I should give the member having the greatest number of votes the ordinary certificate of election, and that it would be for each house to decide on the eligibility of those members whose seats were on any grounds contested; while I admitted as district commander executing the law I was to see that no one ineligible to office under the fourteenth article of the constitutional amendment should be allowed to take office. I did not see that in the case of a parliamentary body that I was called on to decide in the qualifications of the members. In this view I was sustained by a telegram sent to me for my information to the War Department, which had been sent to the Governor of Louisiana and the military commander of the fifth district, and which I quote:

WASHINGTON, June 30, 1868.

To Governor WARMOTH, New Orleans:

We think that persons disqualified under the fourteenth article of the amendment to the Constitution of the United States are not eligible to your Legislature. This is to be determined by the respective Houses, and no oath can be imposed except the oath prescribed by the State constitution.

JAMES WILSON,
Chairman of the Judiciary Committee.
GEORGE S. BOUTWELL,
J. F. FARNSWORTH,
H. E. PAINE,
Reconstruction Committee.

"It will be seen by the above telegram that the distinguished gentlemen whose names were attached were of the opinion that no one ineligible to office under the fourteenth article could take a seat in the Legislature; second, that the respective houses were to judge of the question; third, that no oath testing this eligibility could or should be prescribed in advance of the meeting of the Legislature. These views being in accordance with my own, I acted on them and was present at the organization of the two houses of the Georgia Legislature, to the members declared in my order as having the highest number of votes there being administered only the oath prescribed by the State constitution. After these houses were organized, the provisional governor informing me officially of their organization, but that as far as he could learn no steps had been taken to test the question of the eligibility of members under the fourteenth article, I replied to the Governor that until the State was admitted to representation the Legislature and all the officers were only provisional and subject to the paramount authority of the district commander, and that in the exercise of this power I should consider all acts of the Legislature null and void until satisfactory evidence was presented to me that each house had purged itself of ineligible members under the fourteenth article, provided there were any such in either house; and I desired the provisional governor to communicate these views to each house. On the receipt of this letter each house at once ordered an investigation and inquired into the qualifications of each member, and duly reported this fact through the provisional governor, stating at the same time that neither house had found any member ineligible.

"The provisional governor, on transmitting these communications, expressed the opinion, founded on evidence presented to him, that several members in both houses were ineligible, and called on me to exercise my power and require said members to vacate their seats. On reflecting upon this subject I could not see how I was to take the individual judgment of the provisional governor in the face of a solemn act of a parliamentary body, especially as, from the testimony presented, I did not in several cases agree with the judgment of the provisional governor. The question was simply whether, in the construction of a law and in considering the facts of individual cases, I should make myself the judge, or take the opinion of the provisional governor in the face of the official information that a parliamentary body had gravely and formally, through a committee, examined, reported, and acted on these cases. My judgment was decidedly that I had fulfilled my duty in compelling the houses to take the action they had, and that having thus acted I had neither authority, nor was it politic or expedient, to overrule their action and set up my individual judgment in opposition. By an inspection of the telegrams sent July 13, and the reply of the General-in-Chief, July 21, it will be seen that my views and action were approved. I allude thus in extenso to this subject because his Excellency, the Governor of Georgia, in a public speech recently delivered at Albion, New York, is pleased to attribute the failure of Georgia to be properly reconstructed to my action in failing to purge the Legislature of his political opponents, he having advised me, when he urged such action, that his friends had been relieved of their disability by Congress."

Mr. SHERMAN. I now move that the credentials lie on the table for the present.

Mr. THAYER. I desire to add a few words now in connection with the report of General Meade which has been read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio withdraw the motion to lay on the table?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. THAYER. Neither the Senator from Ohio nor the report of General Meade touches the real question at issue. It is not that the members of that Legislature took the oath prescribed by the State constitution. The point which I made in my former remarks was this: that everything was provisional until the final act of completion of the work of reconstruction. The election of that Legislature was provisional; its meeting and its organization were provisional; and they were required to take the oath prescribed by the reconstruction laws. They had nothing to do with any oath provided for in the State constitution; because the State constitution had not been submitted to the Congress, had not been approved, and the act declaring Georgia restored to the Union had not been passed. I called for the reading of the communication from the Governor in order to bring out this point in support of the objection which I have made; and it is in these words, as set forth by the Governor of Georgia:

"The fact, however, is that all the candidates for the General Assembly who had received the highest number of votes were, without regard to their eligibility under the law?"

There is the point—

"permitted to take seats in the provisional legislative body, and to participate in the organization and the legislation thereof, having first been simply invited to take the oath prescribed in the new constitution, which constitution had not at that time become, and under the law could not then be, of force."

The objection is that that Legislature was composed in part of men who had been expressly disqualified and disfranchised, and who could not become members of the Legislature; and yet, notwithstanding that clear provision of the law, they were permitted to take their seats in the Legislature, and to become legislators and help to elect these Senators. I propose now to inquire whether that action was legal, whether the reconstruction acts have been fully complied with.

The honorable Senator from Ohio says that the Senator-elect from Georgia will be kept in suspense. Human life is in suspense in Georgia; civil order is in suspense in Georgia; loyalty is in suspense in Georgia; human liberty is in suspense in Georgia. I propose, for one, now to inquire whether this state of things is to continue or not; whether there are governments there which can afford protection to human life or not; and if not, why not? There is no necessity for pressing this question now.

Mr. SHERMAN. I renew the motion to lay the matter on the table for the present, and I shall call it up again, perhaps on Wednesday.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WILSON. I present the petition of H. H. Wells, Governor of Virginia, and several other citizens of that State, asking that the Freedmen's Bureau may be continued in that and the other unreconstructed States. I will not ask for the reading of this petition, but simply move that it lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY. I am charged with several petitions on the subject of suffrage, reading as follows:

The undersigned respectfully petition that in your revision of the government of the District of Columbia you will protect the women of the district from being debarred the exercise of the right of suffrage.

These petitions are numerously signed from the State of Missouri, from Watertown, New York, from Waterloo, Indiana, from Neogo, Illinois, from Rockland, Maine, from Mount Vernon, New York, from the State of Massachusetts, from Portage, Wisconsin, from Ellsworth, Maine, and from Faribault, Minnesota, the petitioners being sixteen hundred and fifty-five in number.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petitions will be received and lie on the table.

Mr. RAMSEY presented the petition of Frank C. Dowling, of Douglas county, Minnesota, praying to be compensated for destruction of property by Indians in 1862; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Minnesota, praying for the establishment of a mail route from Yellow Medicine to some point in township No. 114 of range No. 41 of the fifth principal meridian; which was ordered to lie on the table.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SUMNER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 649) to provide for the resumption of specie payments on the 4th of July, 1869; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 650) to enforce the several provisions of the Constitution abolishing slavery, declaring the immunities of citizens, and guarantying a republican form of government, by securing the elective franchise to citizens deprived of it by reason of race, color, or previous condition; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SUMNER. I give notice that at the proper time I shall call up the bill for reference.

Mr. YATES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 651) to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and repeal certain acts heretofore passed on that subject; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RICE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 652) to provide for the issue of arms for the use of the militia in certain States lately in rebellion; which was read twice by its title and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 653) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of naturalization," approved April 14, 1802, and to repeal all acts inconsistent therewith; which was read twice by its title and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 654) to regulate proceedings for the naturalization of aliens; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SUMNER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 178) tendering the sympathy and best wishes to the people of Spain; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CRAGIN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 179) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. MORTON. Let that resolution be read at length.

Mr. SUMNER. Simply the amendment. The Secretary read the amendment proposed to be submitted to the State Legislatures as follows:

ARTICLE —. No State shall deny the right of suffrage or abridge the same to any male citizens of the United States twenty-one years of age and upwards, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, and excepting also Indians not taxed; but any State may exact of such citizen a specific term of residence as a condition of voting therein, the condition being the same for all classes.

The joint resolution was ordered to be printed.

Mr. POMEROY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 180) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. POMEROY. I ask to have the amendment read at length.

The Secretary read as follows:

ART. 15. The basis of suffrage in the United States shall be that of citizenship, and all native or naturalized citizens shall enjoy the same rights and privileges of the elective franchise; but each State shall determine by law the age of the citizen and the time of residence required for the exercise of the right of suffrage, which shall apply equally to all citizens, and also shall make all laws concerning the time, places, and manner of holding elections.

Mr. DRAKE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 181) in relation to the grades of General and Lieutenant General in the Army, and Admiral and Vice Admiral in the Navy; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to be printed.

CHEAP OCEAN POSTAGE.

Mr. SUMNER submitted the following resolution; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed:

A resolution in favor of cheap ocean postage. Whereas the inland postage on a letter throughout the United States is three cents, while the ocean postage on a similar letter to Great Britain, under a recent convention, is twelve cents, and on a letter to France is thirty cents, being a burdensome tax, amounting often to a prohibition of foreign correspondence; yet letters can be carried at less cost on sea than on land; and whereas by increasing correspondence, and also by bringing into the mails mailable matters, often now clandestinely conveyed, cheap ocean postage would tend to quicken commerce, to diffuse knowledge, to promote the intercourse of families and friends separated by the ocean, to multiply the bonds of peace and good will among men and nations, to advance the progress of liberal ideas; and thus, while important to every citizen, it would become the active ally of the merchant, the emigrant, the philanthropist, and the friend of liberty: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to open negotiations with the European Powers, particularly with Great Britain, France, and Germany, for the establishment of cheap ocean postage.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. ANTHONY. I suggest to the Senator to move a recess instead of an adjournment. We have not yet heard from the committee appointed to wait upon the President.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection, if the Senator desires to wait for the message.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio withdraw his motion?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the Senate take a recess for half an hour.

The motion was agreed to.

At the expiration of the recess, the President pro tempore resumed the chair.

Mr. DIXON, from the committee appointed to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of each House had assembled, and that Congress was ready to receive any communication he might be pleased to make, reported that they had discharged the duty assigned them, and that the President instructed them to reply that he would make a communication on Wednesday next at one o'clock by a message in writing.

Mr. HARLAN. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, December 7, 1868.

In conformity to the Constitution and laws, the Fortieth Congress of the United States of America convened this day in its third session. At twelve o'clock m. Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX, Speaker of the House of Representatives, a member from the State of Indiana, called the House to order.

Rev. C. B. BOYNTON, the Chaplain, offered prayer as follows:

Almighty and most merciful God, our Father who art in Heaven! We give Thee most hearty thanks for Thy preserving care, through which all of us here present have been kept during the time when we have been absent from each other and this place, and through which we are permitted once more to gather here and enter upon the duties that belong to our several stations. We bless Thee, O God, that the Congress of the United States assembles now under circumstances that seem to promise so much for the future of this country after the strife and the agitation of the political contest is over, and when men can address themselves to promote the highest interests of the country untrammelled, as they were not before. And while we look round us upon some vacant seats we are reminded especially that it is through Thy care that any of us are here alive. And we pray Thee, O God, that those who have been written down as mourners may be comforted of God.

And now we desire to commend, in faith on the Lord Jesus Christ, these legislators to Thy holy keeping; and we beseech Thee to impart unto them a wisdom that shall enable them to plan and execute all such measures as may tend to produce universal and stable prosperity and peace. So far as law can do it may they restrain all violence and disorder; and do Thou add, O God, a force greater than human law—the teachings of Thy Holy Spirit, the power of Thy truth, so that men's hearts shall incline them to do right without the restraining influence of a statute. Bless all who are engaged in governing the land. May the benediction of God rest on the whole population, and we be prepared at length for that "rest that remaineth for the people of God," for Jesus sake. Amen.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to state that General LOGAN is absent on account of sickness.

ORGANIZATION OF CONGRESS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, offered the following resolution; which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Clerk acquaint the Senate that a quorum of the House of Representatives has assembled, and is now ready to proceed to business.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, also offered the following resolution; which was agreed to:

Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed on the part of the House, to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of the Senate, to wait on the President of the United States, and to inform him that a quorum of the two Houses is now in session, and that Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

The SPEAKER appointed as the committee on the part of the House of Representatives Messrs. WASHBURN of Illinois, SCHENCK of Ohio, and BROOKS of New York.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask to be excused from service on that committee.

By unanimous consent, Mr. SCHENCK was excused, and the Speaker appointed in his place Mr. GARFIELD, of Ohio.

MEMBERS SWORN IN.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House credentials from the Governor of Pennsylvania, in regard to two seats where vacancies have occurred since the last session of Congress, by the death of Mr. Stevens and Mr. Finney. If there is no objection the members-elect will present themselves to the Speaker's desk and take the oath of office.

Mr. LOAN. I suggest that the successor of Mr. McClurg, elected from the State of Missouri, who is present and presents his credentials, be also sworn in.

The following members accordingly appeared, and were duly qualified by taking the oath prescribed by law:

S. NEWTON PETTIS, from the twentieth congressional district of Pennsylvania;

OLIVER J. DICKEY, from the ninth congressional district of Pennsylvania; and JOHN H. STOVER, from the fifth congressional district of Missouri.

REPRESENTATIVE FROM GEORGIA.

The SPEAKER. The Chair also lays before the House, as a question of privilege, the following credentials from the Governor of the State of Georgia, which will be reported in full by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

STATE OF GEORGIA.

By his Excellency RUFUS B. BULLOCK,
Governor of said State:

To Hon. JOHN A. WIMPY, greeting:
Whereas the convention of the people of this State held under the reconstruction acts of Congress passed an ordinance dated March 10, 1868, which ordained that an election be held beginning on the 20th day of April, 1868, for Representatives to the Congress of the United States; and whereas the returns made agreeably to said ordinance show that John H. Christy received the highest number of votes for Representative from the sixth congressional district of this State; and whereas I am satisfied, from the evidence in my possession, that said Christy is, under the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, ineligible to office; and whereas section one hundred and twenty-one of the code of Georgia declares that if at any popular election to fill any office the person elected is ineligible the person receiving the next highest number of votes who is eligible, whenever a plurality elects, shall be declared elected and be qualified and commissioned to such office; and whereas you, the said John A. Wimpy, have received the next highest number of votes in said sixth congressional district at said election, and are not ineligible; and whereas it is my duty, under the laws of Georgia, to commission persons legally elected: these are, therefore, to commission you, the said John A. Wimpy, to take session in the House of Representatives of the United States in accordance with said election under said ordinance, a copy of which is herewith annexed, and to use and exercise all and every privilege and power which of right you may or can do in and by virtue of the constitution in behalf of this State.

Given under my hand and the great seal of the State at the capital in Atlanta, this 24th day of November, A. D. 1868, and of the independence of the United States of America the ninety-third.

By the Governor:

DAVID G. COLTING,
Secretary of State.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand a certificate from Major General Meade, commanding in the military district in which Georgia is situated—a certificate of election under the reconstruction acts of Congress—giving the seat to John H. Christy. I send it to the Clerk's desk and ask that it be read; after which I propose to make a few remarks in reply to the statements in the certificate which has just been read.

The Clerk read as follows:

HEADQUARTERS THIRD MILITARY DISTRICT, (GEORGIA, FLORIDA, AND ALABAMA.)

From returns made to these headquarters by boards of registration of the election held in the State of Georgia for civil officers of said State and for members of Congress, under the provisions of General Order No. 40, issued from these headquarters, which election commenced on the 20th day of April and continued four days, it is hereby certified that it appears that in said election John H. Christy received a majority of the votes cast for a Representative to the Congress of the United States from the sixth congressional district in said State of Georgia.

GEORGE G. MEADE,

Major General United States Army, Commanding.

Mr. BROOKS resumed the floor.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. BROOKS. I will yield the floor temporarily to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. DAWES. I rose to make a motion that both these papers be referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. BROOKS. That is a proper motion, and I propose to make the same motion; but in order to obviate any wrong impression that may go abroad from the certificate of the Governor of Georgia I wish to state that this gentleman from the State of Georgia, Mr. Christy, holds the same certificate that all the other members from Georgia on this floor hold—a certificate from Major General Meade, commanding in the district of Georgia. I wish also to state that no proceedings whatsoever have been taken in the State of Georgia which exhibit any disqualification against Mr. Christy, certainly none which does not equally apply to the gentleman who holds the certificate from the Governor of the State of Georgia in opposition to that of the military commander of the State of Georgia. Mr. Wimpy, who holds the certificate from the Governor of the State of Georgia, was, I understand, during the rebellion a subordinate officer in the rebel army of Georgia in the employ of the Confederate States, and would be utterly disqualified from taking the oath or any oath whatsoever qualifying him as a member of this House, provided he had not been exempted by a special act of Congress from all disqualifications at the last session of Congress. After his exemption from those disqualifications by a special act of Congress, he goes to the Governor of Georgia and claims that Mr. Christy is disqualified. Mr. Christy was always a Union man prior to the war, a Whig editor, who only yielded to the overwhelming impulse of the State of Georgia. Unable to receive protection from the Federal Government, the de jure Government of the United States, as well as of the State of Georgia, he yielded obedience to the de facto government of the State of Georgia. He was a Union man, and voted against secession, and exerted his whole influence as a Whig editor against secession; but when it was discovered that he was elected Mr. Wimpy came here to Washington and received an exemption among the three or four or six thousand—I know not how many there were—exemptions by Congress which were suddenly enacted by Congress. He then went to the Governor of the State of Georgia and claimed the certificate from the Governor, not because he had received the highest number of votes, but a secondary number. On that certificate he presents himself here to this House and claims the right to occupy a seat here.

I do not propose to make any extended remarks upon this subject. I suppose the whole subject properly goes to the Committee of Elections, by whom it will be fully considered. I therefore move that these papers be referred to the Committee of Elections, and on that motion I call the previous question.

Mr. DAWES. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] withdraw that motion, and yield to me for a single moment?

Mr. BROOKS. Certainly, I will do so.

Mr. DAWES. I understand the position of this case to be this—I did not hear very distinctly the gentleman from New York—but a paper is read at the Clerk's desk which makes a charge of disloyalty against one of these gentlemen, and I understand the gentleman from New York to make a similar charge against the other. It has been the rule of this House whenever a charge is made in apparent good faith against the loyalty of any man presenting himself for a seat in this House to refer that question to the Committee of Elections for examination before an applicant is sworn in. These two men, it seems, come here each claiming the seat, and a charge is made against each that he is ineligible to office. I think, therefore, that, without any further delay, it would be proper that this matter be referred to the Committee of Elections, so that that committee may investigate these charges. I accordingly renew the motion of the gentleman from New York.

The previous question was then seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the motion to refer was agreed to.

Mr. BROOKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion to refer was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, informed the House that a quorum of the Senate had assembled, and the Senate was ready to proceed to business; also that the Senate had appointed Mr. Dixon and Mr. HENDRICKS as a committee on the part of the Senate, to join such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives, to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of each House has assembled, and that Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make to them.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MAYNARD. I rise to a question of privilege.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield to me to offer a resolution of inquiry?

Mr. MAYNARD. Certainly.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to offer a resolution calling upon the Department for information.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot entertain any resolution calling for executive information until the morning hour shall have concluded.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Has not the morning hour now commenced?

The SPEAKER. It has not; but it will as soon as the preliminary questions of privilege, such as the swearing in of members, &c., shall have been concluded.

ADDITIONAL MEMBER FROM TENNESSEE.

Mr. MAYNARD. Tennessee believes that by reason of her voluntary and unenforced emancipation of her colored population she is entitled to an additional member of this House. She has, therefore, elected Thomas A. Hamilton, whose credentials I now present, and move that they be referred to the Committee of Elections, and that during the pendency of the matter before that committee Mr. Hamilton be accorded the usual privileges of the floor.

Mr. SPALDING. I do not object to the reference, but I object to giving the privileges of the floor to this applicant.

The SPEAKER. The uniform usage of the House is to allow any person who claims a seat here upon an apparent paper title to have the privilege of the floor.

Mr. SPALDING. We doubt whether this is an apparent paper title. As the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] discloses the case it is an entirely new apportionment of the State of Tennessee.

The SPEAKER. The paper will be referred to the Committee of Elections if there be no objection, after which the Chair will submit to the House the question upon the motion to extend to the claimant the privilege of the floor.

No objection was made; and the motion to refer was accordingly agreed to.

The question recurred upon the motion to extend to Mr. Thomas A. Hamilton, of Tennessee, the privilege of the floor of the House, pending the consideration of his case by the Committee of Elections.

Mr. MAYNARD. I ask that the credentials of Mr. Hamilton be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

STATE OF TENNESSEE.

To all who shall see these presents, greeting:

I, William G. Brownlow, Governor of the State of Tennessee, do hereby certify that at a general election opened and held in said State on the first Tuesday of November, 1868, for the purpose of electing a President and Vice President and Representatives of the State of Tennessee in the Fortieth Congress of the United States, Thomas A. Hamilton, in the county of Shelby, was regularly elected, in accordance with the laws of the State of Tennessee and of the United States, Representative in said Congress for the State at large, and I do, therefore, by virtue of the statute in that case made and provided, commission the said Thomas A. Hamilton, Representative in Congress as aforesaid, during the term and with all the powers, privileges, and emoluments pertaining.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto subscribed my name and caused the great seal of the State of Tennessee to be affixed, at the executive department, in the city of Nashville, at the 28th day of November, 1868.

WILLIAM G. BROWNLOW.

By the Governor:

A. J. FLETCHER,
Secretary of State.

Mr. SPALDING. If the act of Congress provides for the election of a Representative at large from the State of Tennessee then I yield the question; otherwise I say it is an incongruity.

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to say that this application is made in the very best of faith, bottomed upon a solemn enactment of the Legislature of Tennessee and the action of her entire voting population at the ballot-box; and I trust that the courtesy which is ordinarily extended will be extended to this gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Tennessee is that this gentleman shall be entitled to the privilege of the floor of the House during the pendency of this investigation.

Mr. POLAND. Mr. Speaker, I quite agree that when a gentleman comes here with proper credentials duly certified from any district in the United States the usual course is for the House to allow him to take a seat upon the floor until the validity of his election, if any question be made about it, be determined by the House. But by the law of Congress the number of members to which each State is entitled is fixed; and when a gentleman comes here as a supernumerary from a State, there being no district for him to represent, there is no law by which he can be entitled to a seat upon this floor. I suppose it to be true, Mr. Speaker, that many of the States would, by the ratio established under the last census, be entitled to a considerable additional number of Representatives; but it would, I think, be very strange if Indiana or Illinois, or any of the States whose population has so largely increased, should, taking the ratio fixed by the last census, elect so many more members at large as the State would be entitled to in consequence of the increase of population. And although the general principle is that when a man comes here claiming to represent a district, and shows credentials proper upon their face, he should be allowed to take his seat while the question of his title is being considered, yet here there is no district; we have no legal knowledge that there is any population in Tennessee that entitles the State to more than the number of Representatives that it already has upon this floor.

Mr. NIBLACK. Will the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] yield to me for a single suggestion?

Mr. POLAND. Yes, sir.

Mr. NIBLACK. I beg to remind the gentleman and the House that it has not been the uniform practice to admit to the privileges of the floor every gentleman coming here with a certificate claiming a seat. It will be remembered that three years ago, when persons claiming to be elected from the various southern States recently in rebellion, and holding certificates from the acting Governors of those States, presented those certificates and asked to be admitted to seats in this House, they were all denied the courtesy of the floor pending the consideration of their claims to seats, although they held, as I have remarked, regular certificates. Such having been the policy adopted by the House in reference to the gentlemen then claiming seats, I beg to know why a different policy should be adopted in reference to this particular case from the State of Tennessee.

Mr. POLAND. I did not say, Mr. Speaker, that such had been the uniform course.

Mr. NIBLACK. My remark was called out by the remark which fell incidentally from the Chair, to the effect that it had been the uniform practice to extend this courtesy.

Mr. POLAND. I have said, Mr. Speaker, that the usual course—not the uniform course—where a man has presented himself with credentials regular upon their face, has been to allow him to take his seat, although there might be a question as to whether he had been legally elected. I am aware that an exception has been made—whether properly or improperly I have no occasion to give an opinion—where a question was raised in relation to the loyalty, the personal qualifications, of the men presenting credentials; but those cases, whether the decision of the House was wise or unwise, have no application to the question presented here. We might with the same propriety come and claim that Vermont by an increase of population was entitled to an additional member, and elect one by the State at large. I say there is no legal information before the House that Tennessee, under a new apportionment, would be entitled to any more members than she has already on the floor, and no law whatever in existence that I know of by which, until a new census is taken and a new apportionment made for the State of Tennessee, she can be entitled to any more members than now represent that State.

Mr. MAYNARD. Mr. Speaker, I did not propose to argue the question of right at this time. It would be entirely premature; it would anticipate the action of the committee and the province of the committee-room. The question now seems to be one addressed to the courtesy of the House. I will remind my friend from Indiana that the action taken in the case to which he refers had no applicability to the gentlemen themselves. It was not an appeal to our courtesy toward individual gentlemen that came here. The action of the House was based on the attitude of the alleged State government under which they came. The action had reference to those alleged governments, and not to the gentlemen themselves. But I will refer the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] to a precedent in the Thirty-Seventh Congress which may possibly have escaped his notice, as I believe he was not a member of the House in that Congress. Under the general apportionment law the State of California was entitled to two members, and only two. She however believed that she should be entitled in that Congress to an additional member, and elected such a member, Hon. Mr. Lowe, from that State. He came here; his credentials were referred to the Committee of Elections; they examined his claim, reported in favor of it, and he was admitted to his seat; and my recollection is that pending the examination the House of Representatives extended to him the same courtesy that is now asked.

Mr. DAWES. If my friend will allow me. So far as the precise question before the House is concerned, granting to this gentleman leave to come upon the floor, he is correct. Mr. Lowe was admitted to a seat on the floor pending the question, but my friend is mistaken as to the action of the Committee of Elections. It was just the reverse of what he stated. But after the report of the Committee of Elections, which was adopted by the House, a bill was brought into the House, and a law passed Congress allowing to California an additional member; and then, after the passage of that law, Mr. Lowe was admitted. It was passed upon the allegation on the part of California that there had been a great mistake in the census, some of the census returns having been burned up in a fire that took place somewhere in the State, and the House became satisfied in that case that, had all her returns been made, California would have been entitled to a third Representative. But the action of the Committee of Elections was against the applicant under existing law, though they recommended, if I mistake not, the passage of such a law as was passed, and under it Mr. Lowe became a member of the House.

Mr. MAYNARD. The gentleman is correct. Inasmuch as the first application on the part of Mr. Lowe was under the census of 1860, the apportionment under which did not go into operation till the next succeeding Congress, they reported against him, basing his claim on that ground. They, however, as the chairman of the Committee of Elections correctly states, reported a bill in his favor predicated upon the grounds which the gentleman has suggested. The bill passed, and Mr. Lowe was admitted to a seat; but pending that application he was allowed the ordinary privilege of coming upon the floor and holding conference with members if he chose to do so. I trust the same courtesy—and the main question is one of courtesy—will be extended to the case of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. SPALDING. If this is only a question of courtesy, I have nothing further to say. I withdraw my objection. I only objected to its being made a precedent.

Mr. MAYNARD. That is all it can be—an appeal to the courtesy of the House.

Mr. MUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I would not say a word on this matter were it not for settling a question of precedent in this Congress, anticipating that the question would come up from another State. I beg leave to call the attention of gentlemen to the fact that this question of the privilege of the floor is no new one; that on the motion of Mr. Stevens, of Pennsylvania, in the Thirty-Eighth Congress, the House did admit to the privilege of the floor the members elected from Tennessee; and in the Thirty-Ninth Congress, when Colonel Johnson, who had been a colonel in the Federal Army and had served three years, came here claiming a seat from the third district of the State of Arkansas, he was denied the privileges of this floor. On motion of Hon. Green Clay Smith, then a member from the State of Kentucky, on the 13th of February, 1866, the question was brought directly before the House. There was no question as to the status of Colonel Johnson as to loyalty, and Mr. Stevens admitted (Congressional Globe, page 812) that Tennessee, the State from which the gentleman hails, at that time was in the same condition as the State of Arkansas, from which Colonel Johnson claimed his seat. Now, I say that if a colonel of a Federal regiment who had served for three years in the Army could not get in here at all for two years, I do not think we ought to let this gentleman have the privileges of the floor in this case. I say this only as a question of precedent. I know nothing about this gentleman, but I do not want the precedent set, and I shall vote against the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question was put on Mr. MAYNARD's motion; and there were—ayes 45. noes 85.

Mr. MAYNARD called for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

The motion was disagreed to.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has now commenced. The business first in order is calling the States in their regular order for resolutions, during which call bills may be presented for reference also. The call commences with the State of Maine.

EXPANSION AND CONTRACTION OF CURRENCY.

Mr. LYNCH introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1461) to provide against undue expansions and contractions of the currency; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

DRAWBACK ON VESSELS.

Mr. LYNCH also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1462) to allow a drawback upon articles used in the construction of vessels; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. LYNCH moved that the bill be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. ALLISON. That bill ought to go to the Committee of Ways and Means. I move that it be so referred.

Mr. LYNCH. I have no objection to that reference.

The bill was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

ELECTION OF FEDERAL OFFICERS.

Mr. BOUTWELL introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1463) declaring who may vote for electors of President and Vice President and for Representatives in Congress; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

EIGHT-HOUR LAW.

Mr. DAWES offered the following resolution; upon which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire whether any legislation is necessary to secure to Government employes uniformity of compensation under the eight-hour law and an administration of the same according to its true intent, and that they be authorized to report by bill or otherwise.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

UNRECONSTRUCTED STATES.

Mr. BOUTWELL submitted the following resolution; upon which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the Committee on Reconstruction be directed to examine into the condition of public affairs in Virginia, Mississippi, and Texas, and to report as soon as practicable what measures, if any, are necessary for the better protection of life, liberty, and property.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. BOUTWELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REDEMPTION OF GREENBACKS.

Mr. PIKE offered the following resolution; upon which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That in the judgment of this House justice to the public creditor and sound policy demand there should be no further delay in the payment in gold of the United States notes commonly called greenbacks; and the Committee of Ways and Means are hereby directed to report a bill providing that measures be taken at once to effect that purpose.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Is not that resolution mandatory?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Well, I think it had better be referred, and not adopted.

Mr. PIKE. Let us have a vote in the House on it.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope the previous question will not be sustained, and the resolution will be referred.

Mr. KELLEY. I propose to discuss the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine has a right to demand the previous question. If the previous question shall not be sustained the gentleman can rise to debate the resolution, when it will go over under the rule.

The question was put; and the House refused to second the previous question.

Mr. PIKE. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means. The motion was agreed to.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

Mr. ELIOT introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1464) continuing the Freedmen's Bureau in Virginia, Mississippi, and Texas; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Freedmen's Affairs.

Mr. ELIOT. I have here a memorial upon this subject from the Governor and other citizens of Virginia, which I ask may be referred to the same committee by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot, during the morning hour of Monday, ask unanimous consent for anything. The paper referred to by the gentleman can be presented as a paper accompanying the bill, and will be referred with the bill.

Mr. ELIOT. Very well; I ask that that course be taken.

The paper was accordingly referred.

TONNAGE DUTY ON SPANISH VESSELS.

Mr. ELIOT submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing the acts of July 13, 1832, and June 30, 1834, concerning tonnage duty on Spanish vessels.

ALABAMA CLAIMS.

Mr. WOOD submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to this House, if not incompatible with the public interest, copies of the letters of instruction to the American minister at London, relating to the settlement of the so-called "Alabama claims," and any subsequent correspondence with him or the British Government on that subject.

Mr. WOOD moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SUFFRAGE.

Mr. KELLEY introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 363) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask that the joint resolution be read at length.

The joint resolution was read. It provides that the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three fourths of said Legislatures, shall be valid as part of said Constitution, namely:

ARTICLE —. No State shall deny to or exclude from the exercise of any of the rights or privileges of an elector any citizen of the United States by reason of race or color.

Mr. KELLEY. I move that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and that it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BROOMALL introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 364) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States so as to prohibit qualification of suffrage based upon race or parentage; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I ask that the joint resolution be read at length.

The joint resolution was read. It provides that the following amendment to the Constitution of the United States be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States:

ARTICLE XV.—Neither Congress nor any State by its constitution or laws shall deny or restrict the right of suffrage to citizens of the United States on account of race or parentage of such citizens; and all qualifications or limitations of the right of suffrage in the constitution or laws of any State, based upon race or parentage, are, and are hereby, declared to be void.

Mr. BROOMALL. I move that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

NATURALIZATION OF ALIENS.

Mr. BROOMALL introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1465) amending the laws providing for the naturalization of aliens; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read at length. The first section provides that no certificate of naturalization shall be issued to any alien except by a competent court held in the county or parish in which such alien has actually resided for thirty days immediately preceding, and that the proof of residence shall be made to the satisfaction of said court by the testimony of at least one competent witness besides the applicant, who shall also be a bona fide resident of the county or parish.

The second section provides that no certificate of naturalization shall be issued by any court in any State within three months immediately preceding the time fixed for holding an election for State or United States officers in such State.

Mr. BROOMALL. I understand that there is a Committee on Revision of the Laws.

The SPEAKER. There was a select committee of that kind, which has been made a standing committee of the House.

Mr. BROOMALL. I move that this bill be referred to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

RECALL OF REVERDY JOHNSON.

Mr. MORRELL introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 365) requesting the President to recall Reverdy Johnson, minister to England; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. MORRELL. I desire the consideration of this resolution at the present time, and call the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed and read the third time, on which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORRELL] demands the previous question.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the conduct of Reverdy Johnson, minister to England, is prejudicial to the interests and dignity of this nation, and the President is hereby requested to immediately order his recall.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the joint resolution be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The motion to lay on the table takes precedence of the demand for the previous question.

Mr. RANDALL. Is it in order now to make any remarks?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. MORRELL. I withdraw the call for the previous question, and move the reference of the joint resolution to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] withdraw the motion to lay on the table?

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir. We are without any facts to justify the assertion contained in the resolution.

The motion of Mr. RANDALL was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the motion to refer the joint resolution to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. BANKS. I call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. Mr. Speaker, if we vote down the motion to refer, can we not afterward have a square vote on the resolution?

The SPEAKER. If the motion to refer be voted down, the previous question, under the rules, will not exhaust itself until the vote on the third reading of the joint resolution.

On the motion to refer the joint resolution to the Committee on Foreign Affairs there were—yeas 94, noes 41.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. BANKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INTERNAL REVENUE ASSESSORS.

Mr. MILLER introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1466) to reduce the number of assessors of United States revenue; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

AMENDMENT OF BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. MILLER also introduced a bill (H. R. BENJAMIN W. PERKINS.

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Speaker, I was not present when the State of Massachusetts was called, and I ask leave to offer a resolution which I promised the House last session should be presented, but which I was prevented from offering by an accident at the close of the session. It is in pursuance of a promise I made to the House.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested to use the good offices of this Government for the purpose of obtaining from the Russian Government a prompt and just consideration and settlement of the claims of Benjamin W. Perkins, and other citizens of the United States, arising under contracts with said Russian Government, made pending the Crimean war.

Mr. BANKS. I demand the previous question.

Mr. RANDALL. I should like to have some explanation of that resolution.

Mr. BANKS. I hope the House will agree to it.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope that resolution will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. BANKS. I have no objection. Let it be so modified. I now demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. SCHENCK submitted the following resolution; on which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire what amendments to the laws relating to naturalization are needed to give greater security and purity to elections, and particularly whether there ought not to be such provisions enacted as—

1. To confine the power of receiving declarations of intention to become citizens and of issuing letters or certificates of naturalization to the courts of the United States and the higher courts of record of the several States.

2. To require uniformity of proceedings in all such cases in the several courts so authorized.

3. To require that each such certificate of declaration or letter of naturalization shall be signed by the judge presiding in the court from which the same may be issued, as well as attested by the seal of the court and signature of its clerk.

4. To require, under proper penalties, a complete record to be kept of all the steps and proceedings had in the case of each such application, including a full copy of the certificate of declaration issued or letter of naturalization granted, and the testimony in full on which any such letter was granted; and also a full and convenient index of the names of persons naturalized.

5. To authorize letters of naturalization hereafter to be issued in four years after arrival in the United States, but conditioned only to take effect so as to confer rights of citizenship one year after the date of such issue;

And that the said committee be instructed to report at as early a day as practicable by bill or otherwise.

Mr. SPALDING. I move to amend the resolution by inserting the Committee on Revision of Laws of the United States, instead of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SCHENCK. I prefer to have it go to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WOOD. I move that the resolution be laid on the table.

So the resolution was not laid on the table.

Mr. SCHENCK. I withdraw the demand for the previous question for the purpose of saying that as one bill on the same subject has gone to the Committee on Revision of Laws of the United States, and as I understand from the chairman of that committee they are anxious to dispose of this subject at an early day if referred to them, I will modify the resolution so as to refer it to the Committee on Revision of Laws of the United States. I now renew the demand for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution, as modified, was adopted.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

CIVIL-TENURE LAW.

Mr. CARY submitted the following resolution; on which he demanded the previous question:

Whereas the symmetry and strength of our republican form of government consist in its wise distribution of powers between the executive, judicial, and legislative departments; and whereas the Thirty-Ninth Congress by the enactment of the "law regulating the tenure of certain civil offices" transcended the limits of its jurisdiction by taking from the President one of his most essential prerogatives and making him a mere recording secretary of the Senate; and whereas infringements upon the constitutional rights of the Chief Magistrate ought not to be continued:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, That the act regulating the tenure of certain civil offices, passed March 2, 1867, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. MAYNARD. That is an important subject; and I think we should consider it a little; and I therefore move that it be laid on the table in order that we may be enabled to do so.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCOTFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was laid on the table; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NATURALIZATION LAWS—AGAIN.

Mr. McKEE submitted the following resolution; on which he demanded the previous question:

Whereas experience has demonstrated that the naturalization laws of the United States are not such as to advance and promote the best interests of the nation; and whereas whatever may have been necessary in the early days of the Republic, in the way of strict naturalization laws and stringent rules and regulations for the admission of aliens to citizenship of the United States, and for long periods of residence previous to such admission, such necessity now no longer exists; and whereas the best interests of the country and our whole people demand that the avenues to citizenship be made plain, short, and simple, to the end that, by a liberal policy, we encourage and invite men of culture, of industry, and enterprise to our land, encourage migration of foreign-born persons, and thereby more rapidly increase, build up, and develop the vast resources of our country: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill repealing all the existing naturalization laws, and providing that in future naturalization shall only be made in United States courts, upon the oath or affirmation alone of the alien desiring to become a citizen, without any previous period of residence being required; and that such persons upon taking an oath to support the Constitution of the United States and the laws made in pursuance thereof, and renouncing all allegiance to any foreign Power, shall have a certificate of citizenship issued to him by the clerk of said court, and said person shall thereafter be entitled to all the rights and privileges of citizens of the United States, and of the several States in which they may reside, as defined by the Constitution of the United States and the constitutions of the States in which they may reside.

Mr. SPALDING. I hope the gentleman will modify his resolution so as to refer it to the Committee on Revision of Laws of the United States.

Mr. McKEE. I agree to that modification.

Mr. ROBINSON. I suggest that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. Some time ago I offered a bill, which has been printed, on which this whole subject will come up.

Mr. McKEE. I do not accept that modification.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution, as modified, was adopted.

Mr. McKEE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. McKEE also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1474) to establish a uniform rule of naturalization; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Revision of Laws of the United States, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask to have the bill read. The SPEAKER. The bill has already been referred. Is there objection to its being read? Several members objected.

Mr. McKEE. I desire to offer another resolution.

The SPEAKER. It requires unanimous consent.

Mr. ROSS objected.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the votes by which the various bills and resolutions had been referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The joint committee of both Houses, appointed to wait on the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of the two Houses has assembled, have attended to that duty, and ask leave to report that the President will communicate to Congress on Wednesday next, in writing, at one o'clock.

NATURALIZATION LAWS.

Mr. BROOKS. I was absent when the vote was taken on the subject of the naturalization laws. I desire to have my vote recorded in the affirmative on the motion to lay the resolution on the table.

The SPEAKER. That cannot be done in the morning hour of Monday.

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.

Mr. STOKES introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 366) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to have it reported in full.

The joint resolution was read in full. It proposes to submit to the Legislatures of the several States the following amendment to the Constitution of the United States:

ARTICLE XV.

SEC. 1. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall deprive any citizen of the right of the elective franchise on account of race or color.

The joint resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MAYNARD introduced a joint resolution on the same subject, (H. R. No. 367), proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the same committee, and ordered to be printed.

UNIFORM CURRENCY.

Mr. MAYNARD also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1475) to give uniformity to the currency; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

RELIEF FROM DISABILITIES.

Mr. MAYNARD. I hold in my hand a bill for the relief of people from disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution, upon which I would like, some time in the course of the day, to make a statement of facts, and I am just as ready now as I shall be at any time.

The SPEAKER. It must be referred if now offered.

Mr. MAYNARD. Suppose I offer it at a future time, and move to suspend the rules?

The SPEAKER. That may be in order after the morning hour.

Mr. MULLINS introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 368) requiring all applicants for pardon or relief from certain disabilities to give ninety days' notice previous to their application to Congress; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Reconstruction.

KU-KLUX KLAN.

Mr. MULLINS also offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee be, and are hereby, instructed to investigate and report to this House the propriety of the passage of an act to suppress by national authority any and all combinations of persons who belong to or are in collusion with any secret league, or wicked and common enemies to the peace and good order of society, known and designated by the name of Ku-Klux Klan, or by whatever name the said marauders or common enemies of peace and order may be known or designated; and that said combination of persons be declared outlaws and common enemies to good order and civil government, and upon conviction thereof before any court of competent jurisdiction, that the property of such persons be confiscated to the use of the United States, and that the persons thus convicted, be declared infamous, and incompetent to hold any office within the limits of the United States.

DOORKEEPER OF THE HOUSE.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired. The Chair lays before the House the following communication:

Resolved, That this House now proceed to the election of a Doorkeeper in place of Charles E. Lippincott, resigned.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. MULLINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. KELSEY. If nominations are now in order I nominate Otis S. Buxton, of New York, the present assistant doorkeeper, as candidate for Doorkeeper.

vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Charles E. Lippincott as Doorkeeper of the Fortieth Congress.

Mr. Buxton then appeared, and was qualified by taking the oath prescribed by law.

NEW MEXICO CONTESTED ELECTION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House papers in the contested-election case from New Mexico, Chaves vs. Clever; which were referred to the Committee of Elections.

MISSOURI CONTESTED ELECTION.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House papers in the contested-election case of Switzler vs. Anderson; which were referred to the Committee of Elections.

SABINE PASS A PORT OF ENTRY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House resolutions of the constitutional convention of Texas, requesting Congress to make Sabine Pass a port of entry; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

CONDITION OF TEXAS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House resolutions of the constitutional convention of Texas, requesting the Congress of the United States to appoint a committee to inquire into the condition of that State; which were referred to the Committee on Reconstruction.

ENFORCEMENT OF LAWS IN GEORGIA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Governor of the State of Georgia, relative to the inability of the legal State government of that State to carry out the laws of Congress; which was referred to the Committee on Reconstruction.

LAWS OF DAKOTA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the laws of the Territory of Dakota; which were referred to the Committee on the Territories.

DUTY ON COPPER.

The SPEAKER. The next business in order is the consideration of House bill No. 1460, regulating the duties on imported copper and copper ores, being the unfinished business at the adjournment of the House in July last. The previous question having been seconded and the main question ordered, the question is now upon the passage of the bill, upon which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] is entitled to the floor for one hour, he having reported the bill from the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. PHELPS. As this bill embraces a subject-matter taken out of the general tax bill, I would ask the gentleman from Ohio if he is not willing to allow it to go into the general bill, which I understand will be brought forward hereafter?

Mr. SCHENCK. The Committee of Ways and Means will meet to-morrow morning and consider this and other subjects. I do not propose to speak upon it now, but will move an adjournment after gentlemen have submitted such bills and resolutions as they may desire to have referred at this time.

OVERLAND MAIL CONTRACTS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be directed to communicate to this House a copy of any contract or agreement he may have made with Wells, Fargo & Co. for carrying the mails between the termini of the Union Pacific and the Central Pacific railroads, at the rate of $1,750,000 per annum, together with all correspondence on that subject in the Department; and also all the correspondence, proposed agreements, or contracts in the Department in regard to the carrying of said mails; and further, all information in the Department and all the complaints made in regard to the manner in which said Wells, Fargo & Co. have performed the said mail service.

NIAGARA SHIP-CANAL.

Mr. JUDD. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration and adoption by the House at this time of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the bill providing for the construction of a ship-canal around the falls of Niagara, now in the Committee of the Whole, be postponed until the 15th December instant, and made the special order immediately after the morning hour of that day.

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

Mr. JUDD. Then I move to suspend the rules for the purpose of offering this resolution for consideration at this time.

The SPEAKER. The motion to suspend the rules cannot be entertained, because the House is now acting under the operation of the previous question, ordered in July last, upon the bill in relation to the duty on copper and copper ores. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] is entitled to the floor on that bill, but the Chair understands that he yields the floor now for the introduction of such matters as may give rise to no debate.

RECOGNITION OF CRETE.

Mr. SHANKS. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution, which I ask may be read at length, and ordered to be printed in full in the Globe.

No objection being made, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 339) declaring it to be the duty of the United States Government to acknowledge the provisional government of Crete as an independent political State, and to treat with it as such, was received, and read a first and second time.

The preamble and joint resolution were read at length, as follows:

Whereas the American people have on many occasions expressed and at all times feel a sympathy with the progress of liberty and Christian civilization among the people of the East; and whereas the people of Crete have successfully sustained their independence, having organized and maintained a provisional government, which, encouraged by and consequent upon the support given to the cause of Crete by the American people, has accredited a diplomatic agent in the United States: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it is the duty of the Government of the United States to acknowledge the existence of the provisional government of Crete as an independent political State, and to treat with it as such.

Mr. SHANKS. I move that the preamble and joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

HARBOR IMPROVEMENTS IN MICHIGAN.

Mr. FERRY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1476) making appropriations for certain harbors in the State of Michigan; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

REDEMPTION OF LEGAL-TENDER NOTES.

Mr. INGERSOLL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1477) to prohibit the sale of coin on behalf of the United States, and to provide for the redemption of the United States legal-tender notes in coin at par; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DE WITT C. SENTER.

Mr. MAYNARD. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill for action at the present time, to relieve De Witt C. Senter, of Tennessee, from disability.

Mr. BROOKS. Let that bill go to the Committee on Reconstruction.

Mr. MAYNARD. I can explain the bill in a moment.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not yield for the purpose of having any matter introduced which will give rise to any discussion.

Mr. MAYNARD. Very well; let it be referred to the Committee on Reconstruction, with leave to report at any time.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The committee have that right now.

The bill (H. R. No. 1478) was received, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Reconstruction.

AMERICAN CITIZENS ABROAD.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask consent to submit the following resolution:

Be it resolved by this House, That the President of the United States be requested to inform this House what correspondence, if any, in addition to the dispatch of the Secretary of State to Mr. Moran, our acting chargé d'affaires in London, furnished by him June 22, 1868, in answer to the resolution of this House of June 15, 1868, and to furnish to this House copies of any such correspondence for the immediate action of Congress.

I ask consent to be heard a few minutes upon this resolution. As this is an early hour I trust the House will not now adjourn, but will hear an important statement I have to make in reference to a letter published by Lord Stanley, in relation to a subject which involves a high question of privilege for our citizens now suffering imprisonment abroad.

Mr. BANKS. I hope the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] will allow the resolution to go to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. ROBINSON. If I cannot be heard on it now I will withdraw the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks consent to be heard now on the resolution.

Several members objected.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I call for the regular order.

Mr. ROBINSON. Then I withdraw the resolution for the present; but I shall get it in very soon as a question of privilege.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the House (at two o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) adjourned.

PETITIONS.

The following petitions were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

He also laid before the Senate a letter from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, communicating, in obedience to law, a statement of the judgments of the Court of Claims rendered by the court for the past year; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from the Commissioner of Patents, communicating, in obedience to law, a statement showing the amount of expenditures in the United States Patent Office from the 20th of July to the 30th of November, 1868, inclusive, and a statement of moneys received from the 1st day of July to the 30th day of November, 1868, inclusive; which was ordered to lie on the table.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. RAMSEY presented a petition of citizens of Minnesota, praying for the establishment of a mail route from Glencoe, McLeod county, via Silver Lake, to a point near Lake Howard, on the St. Paul and Pacific railroad, near Norway Lake; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. FESSENDEN presented the petition of S. C. Mayberry, praying for the passage of a law providing for the election of President and Vice President of the United States by ballot; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WILSON presented a petition of officers of the Army, praying for the passage of the bill to equalize and fix the pay of officers, and to establish the pay of enlisted soldiers in the Army; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. I present a memorial, signed by a large number of citizens of Tennessee, praying for an appropriation for the improvement of the Tennessee river, which I ask may be laid on the table for the present, until the committees are appointed. I also desire to have it printed, as it is very short.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order to print requires unanimous consent. Is there any objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is the petition about?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is in regard to the improvement of the Tennessee river. If there be no objection the petition will be ordered to be printed. No objection being made, the order to print will be entered.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. HARLAN, it was Ordered, That M. N. Radovich have leave to withdraw his petition and papers from the files of the Senate.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 656) granting a pension to Paulina Jones, of Greene county, Tennessee; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. POMEROY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 182) extending the operation of the Freedmen's Bureau for a limited period in certain States; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. FERRY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 184) for the removal of political disabilities; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 656) to remove political disabilities; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. RAMSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 657) to abolish the franking privilege; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. KELLOGG asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 659) to relieve from legal and political disabilities certain persons engaged in the late rebellion; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 183) to extend the provisions of the act of July 4, 1864, limiting the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims to the loyal citizens of the States of Louisiana and Arkansas; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. ROBERTSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 658) to relieve from disabilities Franklin J. Moses, a citizen of South Carolina; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. SUMNER. I ask if there is any objection to the consideration of that bill now? The Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] has usually had charge of such matters, and I desire to call his attention to this bill. It is a bill to relieve the disabilities of the chief justice of South Carolina, recently chosen by the Legislature. I beg to inquire whether the bill may not be proceeded with to-day?

Mr. STEWART. I know no reason why it should not. The Legislature has extended the time for his taking the oath, and I understand has extended it five months, which will expire on the 29th of this month, I think. It is important that the bill should be passed soon.

Mr. SUMNER. There is no objection to it.

Mr. POMEROY. Let the bill be considered now if there be no objection.

Mr. SUMNER. I ask that the bill be considered.

Mr. STEWART. There is no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill can only be considered at this time by unanimous consent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill must go over under the rule.

RELATIONS WITH SOUTH AMERICAN POWERS.

Mr. SUMNER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States, if in his opinion it shall not be incompatible with the public interest, be requested to communicate to the Senate any information possessed by the Department of State concerning recent transactions in the region of the La Platte affecting the political relations of the United States with the republic of Paraguay, the Argentine republic, the Oriental republic, and the empire of Brazil.

PROMOTION OF NAVAL OFFICERS.

Mr. YATES submitted the following resolution:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby requested to furnish the Senate, if not incompatible with public interests, a copy of the proceedings of the board of admirals which assembled in Washington under the act of January 24, 1865, to examine and recommend for promotion officers of the Navy who distinguished themselves by gallant and meritorious conduct during the rebellion, together with a list of all officers recommended for promotion by said board, and the names of those who were promoted upon such recommendation.

Mr. GRIMES. Let that resolution lie over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made to its present consideration, the resolution will lie over.

CONSIDERATION OF INDIAN TREATIES.

Mr. DRAKE. Is it in order now to call up a resolution amending the rules of the Senate which was offered last July and has been lying on the table ever since?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I suppose it is in order.

Mr. DRAKE. I ask that the resolution be taken up.

Mr. ANTHONY. Let it be read for information.

Mr. DRAKE. It is a resolution that I offered last July amending the rules of the Senate so as to require all Indian treaties to be considered in open session of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By the statement of the Senator, the Senate understand what it is that he proposes to take up. Is there any objection to taking up the resolution for consideration at this time?

Mr. SUMNER. It can be taken up on motion.

Mr. DRAKE. I do not understand that it rests on a solitary objection, but the resolution can be taken up on motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, That rule thirty-eight be amended by adding thereto the following: "Treaties with Indian tribes or parts of tribes shall be considered and passed upon in open session."

Mr. DRAKE. I do not know that it is necessary to make any debate upon that proposition. I have spoken conversationally with many Senators upon the subject since the resolution was introduced. I am under the impression that there is a general feeling in the Senate in favor of the proposition. I think that the treaties with the Indian tribes belong in no sense to that class of treaties which require any secrecy in the consideration of them or require the Senate to sit with closed doors when they are considered. I am of the opinion that a great many things have been done through the Indian treaties here in secret session to the detriment of the country which never would have been done if the treaties had been considered in open session. Guided by these views I desire to see that amendment to the rules made.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs [Mr. HENDERSON] does not appear to be in his seat this morning; and as he might have some objection to the proposition, or might desire to say something on the subject, I suggest to the Senator from Missouri to allow the resolution to lie over until the chairman of the committee is in.

I am by no means certain that upon the consideration of this question it would be thought desirable at the present time to continue making treaties with the Indian tribes. I am not certain that it is not best to dispense entirely with that mode of communication or dealing with them. There may have been in the earlier period of the history of the country a necessity for it. I am inclined to think that both the sentiments and the circumstances under which these treaties originated have changed materially. I doubt exceedingly whether it is necessary to continue this system with these tribes, and I suggest to the consideration of the Senator whether he will not reach his object as well by allowing this resolution to pass over, and in the end referring the whole subject to the Committee on Indian Affairs with instructions to report whether it is not expedient to dispense entirely with this method of dealing with these tribes. I content myself, however, for the present with the suggestion that the subject be laid over until the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs is in his seat.

Mr. DRAKE. I have no objection to the matter being passed over until the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs shall be present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be postponed unless there be objection?

Mr. POMEROY. I was about to observe that this change of the rule would involve a change in two or three other rules of the Senate; and as the Senate had a committee at the last session, of which the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] was chairman, to revise the rules, I think this resolution and all resolutions relating to the rules should be referred to that committee. Let any one Senator propose to amend any one rule, and then it may be in conflict with several other rules. We have tried to revise the rules so that all of them shall be in harmony with each other. We had various conflicting rules until the last session. I should like to have this resolution go to the committee of which the Senator from Rhode Island is chairman, and let them report it by amending one or two other rules, and then we shall have our system of rules so that we can understand them. But we have got several rules relating to treaties, and they are new rules adopted at the last session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on postponing the further consideration of the resolution until to-morrow?

Mr. POMEROY. I move that it be referred to the committee of which the honorable Senator from Rhode Island is chairman.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There are no committees at present.

Mr. POMEROY. That was not a standing committee, but a special committee.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Let it go over.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not know that special committees expire with the session; I am not sure. However, I have no objection to its lying over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be postponed, unless objection be made.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 8, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BORTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

DUTY ON COPPER.

The SPEAKER. The first question before the House is the unfinished business pending at the adjournment last evening, which is House bill No. 1460, regulating the duties on imported copper and copper ores. The question is, under the operation of the previous question, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. BROOKS. I rise to a question of order. As I understand the facts on the record, it was in July last that this bill was before the House, and pending action upon it at that time, under the previous question, the House adjourned. I believe I am correct in that statement of fact. Since that time there has been what the House calls a session in September, and another in November. At the September session a considerable amount of business was transacted, as the record of the House shows. At the November session I was not present; but certain action was taken on the part of the House indicating the transaction of business. Yesterday there was a large amount of business done, not only during the morning hour, but subsequently to the morning hour. The question of order which I wish to suggest, without any particular desire to press it, but rather for the purpose of being informed by the Chair, is that this bill cannot be considered as unfinished business now, having precedence over all other business, because under the ruling of the Chair at the September session, at the November session, and at this session other business has been transacted by the House, thus superseding the unfinished business of the July session. That is the point which I desired to suggest to the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order suggested by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks,] and will state the grounds of his ruling. By a concurrent resolution adopted by the two Houses in regard to the adjourned session of the Fortieth Congress it was provided that at the meeting of the two Houses in September, October, and November, certain transactions, and only such, should then be in order. Those proceedings were in their nature highly privileged, everything relating to the adjournment of Congress having always been held by presiding officers to be of a highly privileged character. Nothing, therefore, transpired during the sessions of Congress held in September, October, and November except the business which had been contemplated by the concurrent resolution of adjournment adopted by the two branches of Congress. If, however, other business had been transacted, that circumstance would not sustain the point of order raised by the gentleman from New York; for the House is familiar with the fact that even during the operation of the previous question propositions are often entertained by unanimous consent, no objection being made to their introduction.

In regard to the most vital branch of the point of order stated by the gentleman from New York, which is as to the business transacted yesterday, the uniform usage has been that unfinished business pending at the close of a week should be taken up at the conclusion of the morning hour on the succeeding Monday. Old members, like the gentleman from New York, are familiar with the fact that since the adoption of the rule in regard to the morning hour on Mondays, which has been in operation some seven or eight years, no business, whether unfinished business or business of any other character, has been allowed to interfere with that morning hour; and the only interference yesterday arose from business appurtenant to the opening of the session of Congress—the call of the roll and the swearing in of members whose seats were uncontested, that they might have the privilege of voting on questions arising during the morning hour. As soon as the morning hour was ended, and the other question of privilege that the Chair then laid before the House was disposed of, the resignation of the Doorkeeper taking effect on Monday, and the office being necessarily to be filled for the convenience of the House, as well as the transaction of business, the Chair called up the unfinished business pending at the adjournment in July.

Mr. BROOKS. I suggest as a matter of fact, according to my recollection of the record, that in the September session a resolution for the appointment of a special committee for the investigation of whisky or revenue frauds was moved by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] upon which a large amount of action was taken, pending which I came into the House and disclosed to it the fact that there was no quorum present, upon which there was a call of the House ordered, and subsequently a repeal of the order for the call of the House, showing, as I understand, the fact that the Chair entertained the motion of the gentleman from Ohio for the appointment of a special committee to investigate the revenue frauds.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is correct. But if he will examine the Globe of the following day he will see in the proceedings that the Chair stated to him, or to some gentleman on the right of the Chair, that business had been transacted during that entire day by unanimous consent, no person objecting, a quorum being therefore presumed to be in attendance. And last evening also, when the copper bill was pending, members on both sides by common consent allowed various other matters to be acted upon until they were cut off by the objection of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH,] which arrested all business.

Mr. BROOKS. I bow to the decision of the Chair; but so long a time has intervened since July, and we have forgotten so much about this copper bill, that I suggest by general consent that the bill be read.

The SPEAKER. Any member has a right to call for the reading of the bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. The roll was being called at the adjournment in July. Can it be interrupted by the reading of the bill?

The SPEAKER. The roll was called down to the letter H, when that was interrupted by the adjournment of the session. It must be resumed, if at all, in full. That is the uniform usage. Therefore, so far as the final calling of the roll is concerned, the order is null and void.

Mr. GARFIELD. Suppose some person had died whose name appears on the upper part of the roll, would it be counted?

The SPEAKER. It would not be counted, as the roll-call would have to be resumed from letter A.

The bill was read at length. It provides that from and after the passage of this act, in lieu of the duties heretofore imposed by law on the articles hereinafter mentioned, there shall be levied, collected, and paid on the articles herein enumerated and provided for, imported from foreign countries, the following specified duties and rates of duty, that is to say: On all copper imported in the form of ores, three cents on each pound of fine copper contained therein; on all regulus of copper, and on all black or coarse copper, four cents on each pound of fine copper contained therein; on all old copper fit only for remanufacture, four cents per pound; on all copper in plates, bars, ingots, pigs, and in other forms not manufactured or herein enumerated, five cents per pound.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Is the bill open to amendment?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. That is not in order. This is not the next parliamentary day after the vote ordering the main question was taken.

Mr. PIKE. Has the bill received its first consideration in Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. It has been reported by the Committee of Ways and Means without objection. That point was raised by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] on the last day of the session in July.

Mr. BROOKS. One further question of order. This is an appropriation bill, doubling and trebling the duty on some articles of copper for the purpose of raising money, and if the bill has not been considered in Committee of the Whole it must go there.

The SPEAKER. It is a bill in the nature of a tax bill. If the point had been made when it was reported by the Committee of Ways and Means in July last it would have been in order, and a single objection would have sent it to the Committee of the Whole. It was received, however, by unanimous consent. Afterward the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] suggested that had he at the time noticed the character of the bill he should have objected.

Mr. BANKS. I understood this should have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. That question is not now pending. The yeas and nays are ordered, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 107, nays 51, not voting 63; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Axtell, Banks, Beaman, Beatty, Benjamin, Benton, Bingham, Blair, Boles, Bowen, Boyden, Broomall, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick B. So the bill was passed.

During the roll-call,

Mr. ELDRIDGE said: I vote "No" on this bill because I look upon it as a tax on "copperheads." [Laughter.]

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, stated that his colleague [Mr. DODGE] was detained at his room by sickness.

The result of the vote having been announced as above recorded,

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REPORT OF SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury for 1868; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

JUDGMENTS OF COURT OF CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting, in compliance with the act of June 25, 1868, a statement of the judgments rendered by that court during the past year; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PAUPERS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Surgeon General of the United States Army, reporting the contracts made by him for the care, support, and treatment of sixty transient paupers in the city of Washington, in accordance with the act of July 27, 1868; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PATENT OFFICE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Commissioner of Patents, transmitting a detailed account of the receipts and expenditures of his office from July 20, 1868, to December 1, 1868, in compliance with the act of July 20, 1868; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

DESTITUTE INDIANS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, with a letter from P. H. Conger, agent for the Yankton Sioux Indians of Dakota, relative to the destitute condition of the tribes of the Upper Missouri; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

LOUISIANA CONTESTED ELECTION.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House testimony in the contested-election case of Jones vs. Mann; which was referred to the Committee of Elections.

GEORGIA LEGISLATURE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the memorial of members of the Legislature of Georgia and others, relative to the illegal organization of that body under the reconstruction laws; which was referred to the Committee on Reconstruction, and ordered to be printed.

SENATORS FROM OREGON.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has had sent to him, by the presiding officers of the two branches of the Oregon Legislature, the resolutions of that Legislature relative to their Senators in Congress. He lays them before this body because the State Legislature has requested him so to do. The title will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolutions of the Legislative Assembly of Oregon instructing their Senators in Congress to resign, having voted for measures plainly and palpably unconstitutional, which have overthrown civil liberty and free government, and consigned the citizens of eleven States to odious and despotic military dictatorship, &c.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The title is enough. I move that the paper be returned to the source from which it came.

Mr. MULLINS. I second that motion.

Mr. WOOD. Let the resolutions be read.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I demand the previous question on my motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated that he presented the paper because it came from a State Legislature.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURNE] will add to his motion, "because it is indecorous."

Mr. WOOD. How can we tell whether it is indecorous or not until we hear it read?

Mr. GARFIELD. The title is enough.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. Let the paper be read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] moves that the paper be returned, and upon that motion calls the previous question. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] asks that the paper be read. Under the rule he has a right to have it read; and it will be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

STATE OF OREGON, DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

To all to whom these presents shall come, greeting:

I, Samuel E. May, secretary of state for the State of Oregon, do hereby certify that annexed is a true copy of "house joint resolution No. 13," the original of which is now on file in this department.

In witness whereof I have hereunto signed my name and affixed the seal of State, Done at Salem, L. S. this 16th day of October, A. D. 1868.

SAMUEL E. MAY,

Secretary of State.

Whereas GEORGE H. WILLIAMS and HENRY W. CORBETT, now holding seats in the Senate of the United States from the State of Oregon, have misrepresented the people thereof in this: that among many other grievous wrongs they have supported and voted for measures in the Senate which were in plain and palpable violation of the Constitution of the United States, among which measures are those known as the reconstruction acts of Congress, which acts in their enforcement have overthrown and subverted civil liberty and free government within eleven States of this Union, and consigned the citizens thereof to odious and despotic military dictatorship, unknown to our Constitution and in derogation of its most sacred guarantees, depriving the citizens of those States, without trial or conviction, of the sacred rights of trial by jury and the elective franchise; consigning their lives, their liberties, and their property to the mercies of those who are without responsibility to the people over whom they exercise their authority, and obedient only to those who hold the power to command them for their oppressive acts. Said pretended reconstruction acts give the people of those States the alternative of a perpetual wearing of the galling yoke of military power and oppression or submission to the more dreary fate of being governed by hordes of ignorant, deluded negroes. The said WILLIAMS and CORBETT have betrayed and misrepresented the people of this State in their support of measures calculated to destroy the constitutional powers and prerogatives of the Supreme Court of the United States, and to usurp the constitutional functions of the Executive. They have been actuated by unworthy partisan motives in their efforts to impeach and remove the President of the United States for pretended high crimes and misdemeanors. In the case of Senator WILLIAMS, comparing his speeches in the Senate upon the tenure-of-office bill with his subsequent votes for the impeachment of the President for a pretended violation of that act, we are constrained to believe that he acted from improper and unworthy motives: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon, That GEORGE H. WILLIAMS and HENRY W. CORBETT, now holding the offices of United States Senators from the State of Oregon, be, and hereby are, instructed to resign the same, to the end that persons may be selected as their successors who will fairly and honestly represent the State of Oregon in the United States Senate.

2. Resolved, That copies of the foregoing preamble and resolution, signed by the president of the senate and speaker of the house of representatives, be forwarded by the president of the senate to said GEORGE H. WILLIAMS and HENRY W. CORBETT, to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States of America at as early a day as practicable.

Adopted by the house of representatives, September 29, 1868.

JOHN WILKENR,

Speaker of the House.

Adopted by the Senate October 1, 1868.

B. F. BURCH,

President of the Senate.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If I had known the character of this paper I should have objected to its being read. I will withdraw my call for the previous question for the purpose of offering a resolution characterizing the paper just read as scandalous, impertinent, and indecorous. And upon that resolution I call the previous question.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. No debate is in order. The resolution of the gentleman from Illinois will be now read:

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the paper just read be returned to the presiding officers of both houses of the Oregon Legislature, the same being scandalous, impertinent, and indecorous.

Mr. WOOD. I desire to say—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not in order, the previous question having been called.

Mr. WOOD. I will only say that this communication is from a sovereign State, a loyal State. [Cries of "Order," "Order."]]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] is not in order, and must resume his seat.

The question was upon seconding the previous question; and being taken the previous question was seconded—ayes 113, noes 31.

The next question was: "Shall the main question be now put?"

Mr. BOYER. Upon that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

So the main question was ordered.

The question was then taken upon agreeing to the resolution; and it was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REPORT OF COMPTROLLER OF CURRENCY.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Comptroller of the Currency, transmitting his annual report; which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

RECEIPTS AND EXPENDITURES, 1865-66.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Treasurer of the United States, transmitting his report of receipts and expenditures for the years 1865 and 1866; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The next business in order is the call of committees for reports, commencing with the Committee on Indian Affairs, which has one morning hour remaining, its first morning hour having been on the 8th day of July last.

SUPPRESSION OF INDIAN HOSTILITIES.

Mr. WINDOM. I desire to submit a resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is it a resolution reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs?

Mr. WINDOM. No, sir; I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be instructed to inform this House, if not incompatible with the public service, what amount of money has been expended for the suppression of Indian hostilities during the years 1866 and 1867, stating as particularly as may be practicable the sums expended in each military district or State or Territory respectively.

Mr. BROOKS. Why not include the year 1868 also?

Mr. WINDOM. I have no objection to including the expenditures for 1868, so far as it may be practicable to give them. I make that modification.

There being no objection, the resolution, as modified, was considered and adopted.

REPEAL OF TENURE-OF-OFFICE ACT.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1481) to repeal an act entitled "An act regulating the tenure of certain civil offices," passed March 2, 1867; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

E. G. PENDLETON.

Mr. MILLER, by unanimous consent, asked and obtained leave to withdraw the petition and accompanying papers of E. G. Pendleton, of West Virginia, asking for a pension.

JOHN WEBB.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1479) for the relief of John Webb, of Tennessee; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

TARLTON A. MIDDLETON.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee, also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1480) for the relief of Tarlton A. Middleton, late a lieutenant in company B, fourth Tennessee infantry; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REDEMPTION OF NATIONAL CURRENCY, ETC.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I have some reports to make from the Committee on Indian Affairs; but before doing so I will yield for a moment to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. INGERSOLL,] who desires to introduce a bill.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by pledge of United States bonds and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1864.

Mr. RANDALL. Does the gentleman from Illinois propose to have that bill printed?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes, sir; I wish to have it printed; and I would like to have it referred to the Committee of Ways and Means in preference to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. RANDALL. The appropriate committee is the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I call for the reading of the bill.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. As the reading of the bill is called for I must resume the floor. I did not yield for the purpose of allowing the bill to be read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas resumes the floor, and the bill of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] is not before the House.

CHOCTAW AND CHICKASAW INDIANS.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 18) for the sale of certain stocks held in trust for the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians, have directed me to report it back, accompanied with a report in writing and a substitute, which the committee recommend for the joint resolution. I move that the report and the proposed substitute be printed, and that the joint resolution be recommitted.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was recommitted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INDIAN COMMISSION.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to report to this House the whole amount of the expenses incurred by the last commission appointed to treat with the Great and Little Osage Indians, the value of all presents presented to said Indians, with an itemized account of all expenses, showing all articles and objects for which expenditures were made; also whether or not any persons attending the councils held with said Indians were transported and subsisted at the expense of the United States; and if so, to give the names of all such persons and the amount of expense incurred for this purpose.

WAR DEPARTMENT—INDIAN BUREAU.

Mr. GARFIELD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1482) to restore the Bureau of Indian Affairs to the Department of War; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read in full, provides that from and after the 1st day of January, 1869, the Secretary of War shall exercise the supervisory and appellate powers, and possess the jurisdiction now exercised and possessed by the Secretary of the Interior in relation to all the acts of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and shall sign all requisitions for the advance or payment of money out of the Treasury on estimates or accounts, subject to the same adjustment or control now exercised on similar estimates or accounts by the Auditors and Comptrollers of the Treasury, or either of them.

Section two authorizes the Secretary of War, whenever in his opinion it shall promote the economy and efficiency of the Indian service, to establish convenient departments and districts for the proper administration of the duties now imposed by law on the superintendents of Indian affairs and upon agents and sub-agents, and to substitute for such superintendents and agents officers of the Army of the United States, who shall be designated for that purpose, and who shall then become charged with all the duties now imposed by law upon the superintendents and agents thus superseded, and without additional compensation therefor. The Secretary of War shall also detail an officer not below the rank of colonel to fill the office and discharge the duties of Commissioner of Indian Affairs. Officers of the Army designated to perform the duties of commissioner, superintendent, agent, or sub-agent shall not be required to give the bonds now required of civil appointees, but shall be responsible for any neglect or maladministration, according to the Rules and Articles of War.

The third section provides that all contracts for transportation connected with the Indian service shall hereafter be made in the same manner and at the same time provided for transportation for the use of the Army, and the accounts of all appropriations, expenditures, and payments of money in the management of Indian affairs, except the pay of officers and enlisted men detailed for service under the provisions of this act, shall be kept separate and exhibited under the head of "Expenditure on account of the Indians."

Section four authorizes the Secretary of War to withhold all special licenses from traders, and under regulations to be by him prescribed to provide the times and places at which all traders complying therewith may present themselves for bargain, barter, and exchange with the several Indian tribes, according to the laws of the United States regulating the same.

Section five repeals all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act.

Mr. GARFIELD. I call the previous question.

Mr. WINDOM. I hardly think the gentleman will call the previous question on a bill of this importance without allowing any discussion.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to say that whatever time is allowed me I will give largely to those who wish to speak after the previous question is sustained. The Committee on Military Affairs have many other matters which they will not be able to get through unless the consideration of this bill is restricted to one hour.

Mr. HIGBY. Is the bill printed?

Mr. GARFIELD. Oh, yes, sir; it is printed and was before the House for half the last session.

Mr. WINDOM. Is it in order to move the reference of this bill to the Committee on Indian Affairs?

The SPEAKER. It is not. If the previous question should not be seconded it will be.

Mr. WINDOM. I hope it will not be seconded, because I assure the House that there are many defects in the bill which they ought to be made aware of.

On seconding the previous question there were—ayes 41, noes 39; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. GARFIELD and WINDOM were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 70, noes 49.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not wish to take the time of the House but for a few moments. I wish to keep my promise to several gentlemen to allow them to be heard. I will state briefly the purpose of the bill and how much it accomplishes, and will then yield some time to the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM,] chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

It will be noticed, in the first place, as the title of the bill indicates, that it is proposed to restore the Bureau of Indian Affairs to the Department of War, where all that class of business was originally transacted. When the Department of the Interior was formed in 1849 the management of Indian affairs was taken from the War Department and placed in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior. This bill does not raise the question of our policy at all. It does not propose to settle any theory of tribal relations or the relation of the Government to the Indian tribes, nor to determine whether we shall continue to treat them as separate nations, subject to treaty stipulations; nor does it touch the establishment or management of reservations. It affects directly no one of these questions. It provides merely that the Interior Department shall surrender the management of Indian affairs to the War Department; and, in order that there may be no sudden shock in the transfer, it is provided that all the duties now enjoined by law upon the Secretary of the Interior in relation to Indians shall be discharged by the Secretary of War, and that without a change of system or policy.

Then the bill provides further in the second section that the Secretary of War shall be authorized, whenever in his opinion it will promote economy and the efficiency of the Indian service, to detail officers of the Army to perform all the duties now enjoined by law upon Indian agents, sub-agents, and other persons employed in the Indian service. It does not immediately abolish all the offices in connection with the Indian department, but it leaves it to the discretion of the Secretary of War to replace them by officers of the Army when the interests of the service require it. I have no doubt it will ultimately result in putting officers of the Army in the places of the civilians now employed in that department. But it was thought best not to say that all civilians shall at once be dismissed the service and military officers substituted. It is left for the present at the discretion of the Secretary of War.

The third section provides that all contracts for transportation in connection with the Indian service shall hereafter be made in the same manner as contracts for supplies or transportation of the Army; and in the amendment which I have added—which is the only material change in the bill, as I introduced it last June—it is provided that all expenditures of money, all appropriations, and all payments made on account of Indian affairs, shall hereafter be kept separately and exhibited under the head of "Expenditures on account of Indians." Hitherto these expenses have not been thus separated, and it is unjust to the Army to charge as a part of its ordinary cost all the expenses of an Indian war; and moreover, we ought always to be able to classify our expenses, and know definitely what is done with the money. I have therefore added to the third section a clause requiring that the accounts, except for pay of officers and soldiers, shall be kept separately. It was thought that the monthly pay of officers and enlisted men employed in the Indian service could not be kept separate from the pay of the rest of the Army without complicating too much the accounts of the Department.

The fourth section authorizes the Secretary of War to withhold all special licenses for traders, and otherwise to regulate the business of Indian trading.

Now, without going at all into the general question of what ought to be done with the Indians, I am satisfied that we shall make a successful beginning of the whole business by putting all this work into the hands of the War Department, where all the officers are subject to military law and to the jurisdiction of courts-martial. The great advantage of the measure will be that we shall abolish a bureau and all its appendages, and at the same time, without additional cost for salaries, secure for the work efficient agents who are subject to a much stricter accountability than civilians can be. We shall thus remove one of the most tempting opportunities for corruption known to our Government. I do not, however, desire to go into the debate. The developments of the last year, it seems to me, have been amply sufficient to bring the subject fully to the attention of the people.

I will add that two years ago this bill, in almost the very words of the print before us, passed the House of Representatives by a large majority, but failed in the Senate. Last session we were not able to reach it, or I believe it would have passed again. But then there were some prominent officers connected with the Indian commission who were not in favor of the transfer of the department. Now, I understand that since the developments of the last fall nearly all of those officers have come to believe that the transfer is necessary. General Grant, General Sherman, and General Sheridan, and nearly all the leading officers of the Army connected with the Indian service, recommend this as the initial step. We therefore propose this measure by itself, making the transfer simply to begin with, and opening the way for any discussion of the Indian problem which it may be thought hereafter best to enter upon.

I give way to the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM;] for how long?

Mr. WINDOM. Say ten minutes; probably I shall not want more than five minutes.

Mr. GARFIELD. Very well. I will yield to the gentleman for ten minutes.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. Speaker, this is in one respect an old question before the House; and yet I now venture the assertion here that there are not five members on this floor who know anything of the provisions of the bill the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] has introduced. It is true it was introduced and printed at the last session of Congress, and placed upon our files, where probably no one has examined it. But now, on the second day of the session, without a single moment's time being given for discussion, the previous question is ordered upon it, and the gentleman doles out the little time he chooses for discussing its merits. I do not know, Mr. Speaker, but it may become expedient to transfer the Indian Bureau to the War Department; but it does seem to me that when we make that transfer it should not be upon the principle stated by the gentleman from Ohio, but that it should be when some system is devised whereby we may hope to improve in our management of Indian affairs. But the gentleman states that all it is hoped we may now accomplish by this proposed change is simply this, to abolish a bureau and to put the Indians under the charge of some other individuals. For one I think we have had experience enough of the treatment of Indians by the War Department to know that true economy forbids that this transfer should be made.

According to the provisions of this bill we are to have hereafter all our Indian affairs managed by the War Department. I believe if there is any Department of this Government in which we find the great maelstrom of the Treasury, where money is sunk by millions and never accounted for, it is the War Department. I have shown heretofore on this floor, when this question was under discussion, that to take care of seven thousand Indians in New Mexico, under the War Department, cost the sum of $1,500,000, while the whole three hundred thousand Indians in the nation cost, under the Indian department, less than four million dollars a year. Now, sir, with such facts as these, which cannot be controverted, I believe the House ought, at least, to have this bill printed, and to read carefully all its provisions before we rush headlong into a transfer of this kind. We should be prepared for a more thorough system in reference to Indian affairs than is now proposed. All that seems to be proposed by this bill is simply a little victory in this old contest as to whether the War Department or the Interior Department shall have the control of Indian affairs. The gentleman from Ohio has nothing digested; he has no reasons to give to show that we shall save money or shall be benefited in any respect by the proposed transfer. He says that our military authorities approve of this bill. Now, I should like to see the report upon that subject which will confirm the statement of the gentleman. Two or three years ago we appointed a peace commission, composed of some of the most prominent military men of the nation, among whom were Lieutenant General Sherman, Brevet Major General Harney, Brevet Major General Terry, Brevet Major General C. C. Augur, and General John B. Sanborn. Those gentlemen have devoted some two years to the investigation of this question, and I will read from the report they submitted on this very point, signed by all the generals to whom I have referred, together with the balance of the peace commission. I read from Executive Document No. 97, of last session, page 20, as follows:

"This brings us to consider the much mooted question whether the bureau should belong to the civil or military department of the Government. To determine this properly we must first know what is to be the future treatment of the Indians. If we intend to have war with them, the bureau should go to the Secretary of War. If we intend to have peace, it should be in the civil department."

I will pause right here (as my time is limited, and as I may not have an opportunity to recur to the point) to ask this House whether it is peace or war they propose to have hereafter with the Indian tribes. This commission, composed of General Sherman and the other eminent officers I have named, says, "If you want war turn the Indians over to the military authorities."

Now, let me give you a specimen of Indian war. I introduced this morning a resolution inquiring what have been the expenses incurred for the suppression of Indian hostilities during the last three years. I have an official report of the amount expended during 1864 and 1865, but the hurry of this discussion has not allowed me to put my hand on the document, which is now on file in the document-room. That report shows that for those years there were expended in the quartermaster's department alone for Indian hostilities $28,000,000; and I believe a careful estimate was made in regard to a military expedition that started from my own State, showing that it cost $6,000,000, and that it killed two Indians! Now, Mr. Speaker, at the rate of $3,000,000 for every Indian killed, you can readily estimate the expense which those gentlemen who, as General Sherman says, propose war, expect to impose upon the Government in killing three hundred thousand Indians.

General Grant estimated, in 1866, that the weekly cost of our then Indian war was $1,000,000. I learn from the newspapers that there are now some five thousand cavalry under the command of General Sheridan engaged in the pursuit of Indians upon the Plains. This, with those on duty at the various posts, is a larger military force than we had engaged in the suppression of Indian hostilities in 1866, when General Grant made his estimate. We may then safely estimate that the cost of our Indian war to-day is not less than $1,000,000 per week. If gentlemen desire, when our Treasury is in its present condition, to declare war against all these Indian tribes, as General Sherman and these other officers say you will do if you transfer the control of Indian affairs to the War Department, thereby continuing this expense of $1,000,000 per week, let them say so.

But, sir, we have now in the field a commission composed of the gentlemen I have named, a commission that challenges the confidence, I think, of every member present. When that commission shall, upon a careful examination of the question, make a report advising that this transfer should be made, and when a system shall have been prepared for the management of our Indian affairs, I shall offer no further opposition to this proposition. But I think it is altogether premature that a measure of this kind should, under the operation of the previous question, a large portion of the bill not having been printed, be forced through the House while such a commission is in the field and before we have any report from it on the subject, except a report advising us not to adopt this measure. I read further from the same report:

"In our judgment such wars are wholly unnecessary, and hoping that the Government and the country will agree with us, we cannot now advise the change. It is possible, however, that, despite our efforts to maintain peace, war may be forced on us by some tribe or tribes of Indians. In the event of such occurrence it may be well to provide, in the revision of the intercourse laws or elsewhere, at what time the civil jurisdiction shall cease and the military jurisdiction begin. If thought advisable, also, Congress may authorize the President to turn over to the military the exclusive control of such tribes as may be continually hostile or unmanageable."

"But," say the gentlemen composing this commission, "we cannot now advise this change." Let us, then, Mr. Speaker, wait until the commission that is investigating this subject shall have time to report. Let us check our hot haste until the bill can be printed and members can have an opportunity to read it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. Although this bill now reported by the Committee on Military Affairs is not in its details all that I think it ought to be, I nevertheless entirely agree with the chairman of the committee in the necessity of its passage. This Indian question, so far as relates to the western frontier, has become one of great importance, as I know from personal observation. It is becoming a practical question upon which it is necessary for Congress to act. It is not, if I may so express myself, a question of philanthropy. It is not even a question whether or not the white race or the Indian race are the aggressors, but it has become a question of practical administration. The Government of the United States has inaugurated a great system of internal improvement by which we are constructing at this moment two great lines of railway across the interior of this continent. Now, whatever may be the policy pursued by this Congress; whatever may be the action of the Interior or the War Department, the fact remains that every day the civilization of this country is coming in contact with the Indian tribes; that every day new aggressions are being committed on the one hand or the other, and under any system or any principle of administration which may be inaugurated by Congress or by either the War or the Interior Department our civilization will march forward in spite of all opposition. Representing, as I do, a State on the western frontier, and knowing something of what is going on there at this moment, I am very far from agreeing with the declaration made by General Sherman; that our western frontiers are stretched out two hundred miles too far, and that our frontier settlers must live in block-houses and forts, as was done in the early times in Ohio and Indiana. On the contrary, I believe that our civilization will go on, and that it ought to go on, and that it is not within the power of Congress or of any department of this Government to arrest in any way or to any extent this tide of civilization which is marching on irresistibly until it will meet from the east and from the west on the very summit of the Rocky mountains.

What, then, Mr. Speaker, does this bill propose to do under these circumstances? Why, sir, I think the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] is mistaken. I do not know from what report he read, but I believe it was from the report of the peace commission of last year; and if I am rightly apprised of the fact, I think that these very gentlemen, from whose report he read, had a meeting in the city of Chicago not many weeks since, at which they adopted, by a majority vote, a resolution in favor of transferring the Indian Bureau from the Interior to the War Department.

Mr. WINDOM. The gentleman is entirely mistaken. I was there at the time, and I read the report afterward, and never saw any such thing.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I speak from the published report in the newspapers.

Mr. WINDOM. Have they ever made to Congress any report since that from which I read changing their recommendation?

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. Probably not. But this whole question was before the commission, as the gentleman well knows; for he says he was at the meeting at Chicago not many weeks ago, and that peace commission divided in the views they expressed; and the present Commissioner of Indian Affairs has taken the trouble to send to members of this and the other branch of Congress a protest against the transfer of this bureau to the War Department, manifesting a very extraordinary interest in the preservation of the present status of the Indian Bureau, which, I hesitate not to say here, has been for some time past, and is to-day, in its administration a standing disgrace to this Government. Why, sir, if I had time I could detail in the hearing of this House the operation of this Indian Bureau in my own State, exhibiting a system of corruption and of aggression upon the rights of the Indians and the people, and a system of public plunder under the present administration of the Interior Department, such as I believe has never existed before in the history of this Government. It was only last winter that the President of the United States appointed the present head of the Indian Bureau as chairman of a commission to go to Kansas for the purpose of making a treaty with the Osage Indians. And, sir, what was the result? Why, the present Commissioner of Indian Affairs, attended, as I may say, by a retinue of speculators and of public plunderers, went and got a treaty signed, and brought it back to this capital, by which eight million acres of the public domain of the State, which belongs to the people of this country, was attempted to be stolen, and the Indians divested of the title at a nominal price, and the land passed into the hands of men whose reputation, as you well know, sir, and as this House well knows, is not above suspicion. On this very day I have deemed it my duty to offer a resolution to this House calling upon the Secretary of the Interior for information as to the manner in which these results were accomplished. And, sir, I might go on and show to this House and the country that not only in reference to these Osage Indians, but in the case of nearly every tribe of Indians in Kansas and elsewhere, the funds appropriated by your Indian bills, the funds annually appropriated here for the benefit of these Indians, instead of passing into the hands of the Indians, under the present administration of the Indian Bureau, pass into the hands of men who to-day, if not sitting in your Interior Department and Indian Bureau, surround and control those men in the administration of Indian affairs. Sir, I have no hope of any reform by which the Indian question in this country will be settled, and by which a system of economy founded upon just principles as connected with this question may be established, except by transferring this bureau from the Interior Department to the control of the War Department, as provided in this bill.

Mr. WINDOM. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. Certainly.

Mr. WINDOM. I desire to ask him whether General Grant cannot appoint an honest Commissioner of Indian Affairs as well as detail an honest military officer, or do shoulder-straps insure honesty always?

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. Well, in reference to the question of appointments, I have watched it quite attentively during the last three or four years, and I will say in reply to my friend from Minnesota that I have about given up all hope of reform in reference to that question; and my experience is that I have known but very few men under this Administration obtain an appointment as an Indian agent or under the Indian Bureau simply for the purpose of receiving the salary connected with the office.

Mr. WINDOM. The gentleman does not answer my question. Are we any more likely to get honest men with shoulder-straps than honest men without them?

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. The difference is this: our military officers are under the restraints of military law. They are appointed for life; they have reputations to maintain as officers of the Army, whereas your civil appointees may be men who obtain these offices because they desire to make money out of the Government and to plunder the Government, and when their plundering is over drop out of sight without any punishment whatever.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. PAINE.]

Mr. PAINE. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of the transfer of the Indian department to the Department of War, but there is in this bill one feature to which I wish to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, suggesting to him a change. By the second section of his bill he provides that officers of the Army who shall be intrusted with those duties which have hitherto been conferred upon the officers of the Indian Bureau as such shall not be required to give the bonds which have hitherto been required of officers performing corresponding duties who belong to the Indian Bureau, or who are appointees of the Interior Department. It is provided, however, in this bill that these officers shall be held responsible under the Articles of War. Now, I can see no reason why in this bill we should deviate from the usage which has uniformly prevailed in the Army of requiring a bond from those officers whose duty it has been to disburse money, to purchase supplies, or to handle or manage property. We have hitherto required bonds from officers of the quartermaster's department, and bonds from officers of the commissary department, and bonds from officers of the pay department. And now, why in this bill should we intrust the disposition of large sums of money to officers who give no bonds, deviating from the rule which has always obtained in this Government, so far as the War Department is concerned? Why should not the officer who is required by this bill to disburse large sums to the Indians be required to give bonds just as the officer of the pay department, or the officer of the commissary department, or the officer of the quartermaster's department has hitherto been required, and is now required, to give bonds to cover a like responsibility? I would suggest to the gentleman, then, that in the seventeenth line of the second section he strike out the word "not." The sentence provides that—

Officers of the Army designated to perform the duties of commissioner, superintendent, agent, or sub-agent shall not be required to give the bonds now required of civil appointees, but shall be responsible for any neglect or maladministration according to the Rules and Articles of War.

I would suggest that the word "not" be stricken out, so that these officers may be required to give bonds. I am aware that the bill is not in such a position now that I can myself offer the amendment I have suggested; but I will yield the floor, making this request of the gentleman in charge of this bill: that he shall explain to the House the reason, if he has a good reason, why these officers are not to be required to give bonds as other Army officers in like circumstances have hitherto been required to do.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now yield for ten minutes to my colleague from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] is very much mistaken, so far at least as some of us are concerned, including himself, of course, when he states that this is a new question, for the discussion of which gentlemen here are not prepared. He remembers, as I do, that this is an old question.

Mr. WINDOM. I said it was an old question.

Mr. SCHENCK. In the Thirty-Ninth Congress this very bill, with slight alterations, if any, was passed twice by the House of Representatives; once as a substitute for a bill reported by the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM,] as chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and at another time upon its own merits, as a distinct bill upon the Calendar. And it failed to become a law only because of the opposition it met with in the other branch of the national Legislature. It is therefore not a new question to members to propose to restore to the War Department a bureau which was formerly connected with that Department—this Bureau of Indian Affairs; and I shall support this bill now, as I did a similar bill upon a former occasion, because I believe there is no reform proposed to this House so effective to break up a foul nest of thieves as the passage of a law of this kind would be.

I do not know why it is, but it seems almost impossible for Indian affairs to be touched without soiling as with pitch those who lay hold of the subject. But the fact, at least, is incontestible, and it appears to me that the whole country is now prepared to conclude that we have tried this system of civil administration long enough. It is true, as the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] has said, that a report was made by a committee, or a commission rather, of which General Sherman was one member, hesitating upon the question of throwing back into the War Department the whole administration of this subject. But the quotation made by the gentleman, as well as the text in connection with that quotation from that report, will show him that it was a compromise of opinion between General Sherman and others on the commission with him and some civilians who were also engaged on that same commission. But even the quotation the gentleman makes does not sustain him. He says General Sherman states that if you want war, then the administration of the Indian Bureau should be thrown into the War Department. That is not the statement made by that commission. It is: "If we are to have war, then by all means the Indian Bureau should be transferred to the War Department." But if everything is to go along and be lovely and of good report, and there is to be no difficulty, then, perhaps, you may succeed—"with a great deal of stealing" ought to be interjected—by continuing it under the civil administration. If we are to have war, however, then by all means let the Indian Bureau go back to the War Department.

Now, sir, the Indians have settled that question for us. We are not only to have war, but we now have war. And instead of killing two Indians I think a great many have been killed as a consequence of these hostilities. The gentleman's remarks made to-day precisely resemble those he made in the last Congress. But the facts have changed, and his present remarks do not fit the new history.

Mr. WINDOM. Will the gentleman tell me how many Indians have been killed?

Mr. SCHENCK. I cannot tell how many, because I have not the statistics. But from recent information which has been received I believe that one hundred and fifty or more Indians have been killed, at one time, and in one engagement.

Mr. WINDOM. And that will prove, I have no doubt, another Sand Creek massacre, when the facts of the case are known.

Mr. SCHENCK. Now, sir, I wish to state what to my mind is a strong inducement for restoring this bureau to the War Department. Your Indian agents are interested in getting up war, and the history of the Indian department shows that in about nine cases out of ten where we have had Indian hostilities they have been either provoked or encouraged or connived at, for the sake of contracts, by these Indian agents and sub-agents and their friends. When we get into war, then the Army is called upon to settle the difficulty by fighting it out. The officers of the Army will not, of course, desire to have war, if they are to undergo the exposure and peril and suffering and death consequent upon a state of hostilities. Let those, then, who have to fight the matter out, and who are interested in keeping the peace, be charged with the administration of this department, and we shall not have a parcel of corrupt civilians getting up the wars which give no peril to them after they have been commenced, but which are to be left to others to fight out to the end. Let the Army officers, who must fight out these wars with the Indians, know in advance that they can prevent them if they will, and we shall not be so likely to have war.

Now, sir, my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] objects to one particular section of this bill, the section which provides that the officers of the Army designated to perform the duties of commissioner, superintendent, &c., shall not be required to give bond. Referring to the first part of the section, it will be found that it is left within the power of the Secretary of War to give up gradually, or abruptly if he will, all employment of civilians in these different offices and to substitute by detail for this purpose officers of the Army of the United States. If he shall thus discontinue the employment of civilians who give bonds—and whose bonds do not appear to have done us any very great degree of good, either in maintaining peace or in securing a wise and honest administration of Indian affairs—and shall employ by detail officers of the Army, it seems to me appropriate that these colonels, majors, captains, lieutenants, &c., shall be left to that responsibility which is imposed upon them as officers of the Army.

Mr. Speaker, I have very little faith in official bonds at any time. I am not quite certain, so far at any rate as elective officers are concerned, but that the system of official bonds is all wrong, and that the people, or their agents who select other agents, should suffer if the agents are corrupt, so that the people and those who serve them might take warning and employ only good men. But if you want security in this case, this bill proposes a very much better security than any ever derived from any bond given by anybody. Under the present system who are appointed Indian agents? Broken-down lawyers, physicians who cannot get practice, men who have been busy at the polls in our several districts and who come to us and beg us to solicit for them from the Department of the Interior an appointment of that kind, that they may go out and take care of themselves and their families. I do not say it is uniformly the case that such are the appointments; but as a general rule that is the way in which men are rewarded for political services. When thus appointed Indian agents, they run a career long or brief as the case may be, picking up some money by collusion with contractors or cheating the Indians or getting up wars; and they retire from office with or without much in their pockets, according to the chances they may have had. Whenever they are ready to retire, they retire by resignation; nobody can prevent their retirement; and there is an end of the matter. If you seek to hold them responsible upon their bonds for any malfeasance, you are not likely often to collect anything either from them or their securities. But when an officer of the Army is detailed for this service and enters upon the duty, he puts at stake his commission, which is his support for life. He puts at stake his reputation. He is liable to summary trial and punishment by a court-martial for misconduct in connection with Indian affairs as he would be for any other misconduct in the field or in the garrison; and I would not give the security derived by holding a court-martial over the heads of one of these officers, and the danger of his losing his commission by sentence of court-martial for any misbehavior, for all other securities that by bonds or otherwise you can require of any of these agents you may send to do this work. I hope, therefore, this principle will be preserved.

Mr. WINDOM. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. He says you cannot touch Indian affairs without being contaminated. Is that the particular reason why he would send a military officer to take charge of these people in future? And why does he wish to vary the ordinary rule? Had you not better take all the security you can? Why should you dispense with the present security and require another?

Mr. SCHENCK. Because we substitute a better security in its place.

Mr. WINDOM. Why not take both?

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not see the necessity of taking one which is inefficient when we can substitute another which we think perhaps will be efficient.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to ask the gentleman whether he proposes to increase the pay of regular Army officers employed under this bill?

Mr. SCHENCK. No, sir; and for that reason the gentleman will find, if he considers that point in the case, that it runs right into a question of great economy, to be effected by adopting this bill.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I have agreed to yield five minutes to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HIGBY. Mr. Speaker, if we are to give credit to the argument in favor of this bill it amounts to about this: that there is no virtue in this nation except it be in the Army of the United States. There is a great outcry against the present system of administering our Indian affairs through the civil department. But, Mr. Speaker, the grand difficulty is that we have no system at all, and are seeking a remedy for the want of one by transferring the Indian Bureau from the Interior to the War Department, simply changing its administration from one class of men to another. Now, sir, in my judgment this attempted remedy will prove a failure. This nation will find itself in as bad a condition, if not a worse one, after you have made the change than it is now. Until we devise some system by which the department shall be administered, and have its checks and balances, we shall find ourselves in just as much trouble as we are now and have been for years.

Sir, I do not believe in the doctrine that men in one department of life are more honest than they are in another; and when I am told that because these men are in the Army during their lives that will be a check upon them and an inducement to perform their duties honestly, I do not believe it. I do not believe we have more honest men there than in other departments of life. I think there are just as good men there as elsewhere, and no better.

The chairman of the committee tells us that it is not the object of this bill to give power or to increase the military force. I think I see in it that there is to be a direct connection between the War Department and the administration of Indian affairs—that is, a war power is to be exercised over the Indians. Sir, we have got to return, in our manner of dealing with the three hundred thousand Indians in this country, to some system of honesty and integrity like that carried out by William Penn, who came single-handed and alone into this continent and dealt successfully with the Indian tribes around him.

Mr. WOODWARD. By deeds of peace.

Mr. HIGBY. Yes, sir, by deeds of peace, as my friend well says. He came among them with no weapon of war, and he secured a lasting peace. Let this nation profit by his example.

But, sir, it is not from the Indian Bureau that the trouble comes; it comes from other sources. There is no power in that department to check the evil, because there is no system in the administration of Indian affairs, and you do not create a system by simply transferring it to the War Department. I differ from the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] in reference to that question. He says it was before the Thirty-Ninth Congress. It was more or less, but it has not been before the Fortieth Congress for its investigation. There are many members here now who were not in the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and I think it would be well for them to have an opportunity to consider this subject. It is now only the second day of the session, and this bill, which is one of great importance, is brought forward to be passed here simply on an hour's debate. I hope it will not pass.

Mr. GARFIELD. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has eleven minutes.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I will conclude this debate by calling attention to two or three points that have been made. And first, let me correct my friend from Minnesota in regard to the decision of the Indian commission which sat last year and made a report in reference to Indian affairs. That commission was divided on the question of transferring the bureau to the War Department, and they finally, in the hope of maintaining peace with the Indians, recommended first, that for the present the bureau should not be transferred to the War Department, but should be made a separate, independent department; and, in the next place, that Congress be asked to pass an act fixing a day not later than the 1st of February, 1869, when all subordinate officers, superintendents, and agents of Indian affairs should be dismissed from their positions because they had become so mixed up with frauds that they could not be trusted. All this, however, was based on the hope that peace might be maintained with the Indians. But the commission very distinctly say that if we are to have war the bureau ought to be transferred to the War Department.

Now, what are the facts? The commissioners concluded several treaties with the Indians. And here let me say that it seems to me a sort of mockery for the representatives of the great Government of the United States to sit down in a wigwam and make treaties with a lot of painted and half naked savages, only to have those treaties trampled under foot the very moment our officers are out of sight. This whole matter of making treaties with our wards is ridiculous. Still, I will not enter upon that subject.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I would ask the gentleman if the peace commission itself did not state that in a great majority of cases the first infraction of the treaty came from the whites instead of the Indians?

Mr. GARFIELD. I happen to hold in my hand a much later document than the report of the peace commission, and I will read from it. It is the official report of Lieutenant General Sherman, dated November 1, 1868, in which he gives a detailed and elaborate account of what has transpired in the Indian country since the peace commission sat, and he tells the reasons why the peace commission took the course it did. He says that soon after the conclusion of the treaties, without any new provocation on the part of the whites, the Indians by a concerted action began this terrible war upon the frontier. This report very fully answers the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. INGERSOLL,] that all aggressions are made by the whites. After giving a detailed account of the Indian hostilities and what has been done to repress them, he argues the subject elaborately, and says:

"I have to recommend that the Bureau of Indian Affairs should be transferred back to the War Department, where it belonged prior to 1849."

That is General Sherman's official report of November 1, 1868.

Mr. WINDOM. What paper was it printed in?

Mr. GARFIELD. It has been printed in the papers generally. I am now reading it as printed in the National Intelligencer, a file of which is kept in the Clerk's office.

Mr. WINDOM. I have never seen the report.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. I would ask the gentleman from Ohio if the peace commission was not divided upon this question at Chicago?

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not know how it was divided at Chicago. I know it was divided last year, and that the majority was against the transfer of the bureau. It may have been divided this year, but the commission report in favor of the transfer now.

Mr. MUNGEN. Did not General Sherman state, when he was before the Committee on Indian Affairs of this House and the joint Committee of the two Houses last session, that if the appropriation for the annuities, or rather the advancement of the annuities, was not made last May, according to the arrangement, it would bring on a war, and did not the failure to make the appropriations produce the war?

Mr. GARFIELD. I cannot say whether he did or did not. If he did I am not aware of that fact. I know that General Sherman says in his recent official report that this war was brought on, not by any fault of the whites, but by the faithlessness and wickedness of the Indians themselves.

Now, General Grant sends his annual report to the Secretary of War under date of November 24, 1868, only two weeks ago, and in it uses this language:

"I would earnestly renew my recommendation of last year that the control of the Indians be transferred to the War Department. I call special attention to the recommendation of General Sherman on the subject. It has my earnest approval. It is unnecessary that the arguments in favor of the transfer should be restated. The necessity for it becomes stronger and more evident every day."

Thus it will be seen that the General of the Army approves the reports of General Sherman and General Sheridan. All this is really in accordance with the report of the peace commission; for they say if we are to have war the bureau had better go to the War Department. And in the same report, from which my friend from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] read, there is a description of the constant difficulty we are now in. It is in these words:

"As things now are, it is difficult to fix responsibility. When errors are committed the civil department blames the military; the military retort by the charge of inefficiency or corruption against the officers of the bureau. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs escapes responsibility by pointing to the Secretary of the Interior, while the Secretary may well respond that, though in theory he may be responsible, practically he is governed by the head of the bureau. We therefore recommend that Indian affairs be committed to an independent bureau or department. Whether the head of the department should be made a member of the President's Cabinet is a matter for the discretion of Congress and yourself, and may be as well settled without any suggestions from us."

That report was made a year ago. With this triple-headed monster managing Indian affairs, neither one knowing how much he has to do, each one throwing the blame of every failure on the other; with the events of the past season and the war we are now suffering, and with the recommendation of all those most intimately acquainted with the subject; with all these facts before us, I hardly think the case needs further argument.

I desire, however, to say a word in reply to my friend from California, [Mr. HIGBY.] He says we should have an Indian policy first and make the transfer afterwards. I think not, Mr. Speaker. Let us meet the present necessities of the case by making one department of the Government wholly responsible, and call to the work officers who are amenable to military laws, and we shall have taken a great step toward reforming abuses. After that we can go forward and determine what shall be done with the Indians; whether they shall be confined to reservations and not have any rights which white men are bound to respect when they leave their reservations, or whether we shall make a rule that no white man who enters an Indian reservation without authority shall have any rights which an Indian is bound to respect. Whatever we do ought to be the result of deliberation and examination.

I will now yield to the gentleman from Minnesota for a question.

Mr. WINDOM. I wish to make a single remark. I wish to say that I have never seen the report of General Sherman which the gentleman has read. I did not know there was any such thing in existence. But, sir, I do not feel any sort of interest in this matter. I never had a friend of any kind in the Indian Bureau. And I will ask the gentleman from Ohio a question. What was the motive of relieving these Indian officers from bonds? Why discriminate in their favor in that respect?

Mr. GARFIELD. I am glad that my friend has called my attention to that point, and I will take up the minute and a half left to me in replying to it. It is a mistake to suppose that the bill makes any discrimination between military officers employed in the Indian service and those on other duty. There is a class of officers of the Army charged with the disbursement of public money or the safe-keeping of public property who are required to give bonds for the faithful performance of their duties. If they do any duty under the provisions of this bill, they will be under bonds, as now provided by law. But if an unbonded officer be sent to the Indian country in command of troops or on other duty, I do not think he ought to be required to give bonds, unless the same duty performed elsewhere required bonds also. The rule for army officers should be uniform.

Mr. WINDOM. Does not the agent pay out money, and yet he is not required to be a bonded officer?

Mr. GARFIELD. The bill does not require any addition to the bonds the officer gives as an officer of the Army. He will give the same bond wherever he may serve.

Mr. WINDOM. You expressly provide that this officer shall give bonds for other duties, but when he comes to do this duty he shall not give bonds.

Mr. GARFIELD. Not at all; but that he shall not be compelled to give additional bonds because he goes into the Indian country. It seems to me that we should find great difficulty in carrying out the bonded system now in use in the Indian department after the transfer. Officers of the Army are bonded under very different regulations. Moreover, I have more faith in courts-martial than bonds to secure faithful conduct. I now demand the previous question.

Mr. WINDOM. Is it in order to move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs?

The SPEAKER. It is not, pending the demand for the previous question.

Mr. WINDOM. I move that the bill be laid on the table.

The motion was not agreed to.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. GARFIELD demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. WINDOM demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 116, nays 33, not voting 72; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Archer, Arnell, Axtell, Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Beatty, Benton, Bingham, Blaine, Blair, Boyden, Boyer, Broomall, Buckland, Roderick R. So the bill was passed.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER stated that the morning hour had expired.

Mr. ROBINSON took the floor, and yielded to

Mr. SCHENCK, who said: Mr. Speaker, I wish to state to gentlemen of the House who have business upon the Speaker's table that I propose on Thursday morning, after the morning hour, to move to proceed to the business upon the Speaker's table, so as to dispose of the bills which have accumulated there.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I wish to get to the Speaker's table at once, so as to take up and pass a Senate joint resolution canceling a contract with Messrs. Dempsey & O'Toole, which is a fraud upon the Government.

AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. JULIAN, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 371) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

SWAMP LANDS.

Mr. ORTH, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1483) in reference to swamp lands; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

DEMPEY AND O'TOOLE.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If it is in order I now move to go to the business upon the Speaker's table, so that we may take up and act upon the joint resolution to which I have referred.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope that will be done. The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] is upon the floor; but the Digest says that any member can be taken from the floor at the expiration of the morning hour by the motion to go to the business upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move, then, that we go to the business upon the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognized the gentleman from New York, [Mr. ROBINSON,] but he does not know for what purpose he rose.

Mr. ROBINSON. I rise for the purpose of offering a resolution concerning citizens imprisoned in Great Britain. The Committee on Foreign Affairs, whom I intend "to walk into gently," pledged us ten months ago to report on the subject, and they have not done so. I wish to show such a state of facts as will demand the attention of this House and the country.

The SPEAKER. That is not now in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. I will rise every five minutes between this and the next 4th of March to get the floor on this subject.

The SPEAKER. The State of New York was called for resolutions yesterday.

Mr. ROBINSON. I wished to be heard on it, and therefore I withdrew the resolution at that time, as debate was not then allowable.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the House proceed to business upon the Speaker's table, which is first in order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent to take up that joint resolution to which I have referred, and pass it now.

Mr. ROBINSON. My friend will excuse me, but I rise to a parliamentary question. Can I move that the gentleman from Illinois be censured as one of the Representatives of the people who are putting off the question I have referred to and thereby bringing disgrace upon this country?

The SPEAKER. The remarks about members "bringing disgrace" is not parliamentary.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not mean it with regard to any individual member. I say that if we delay longer to do justice to our imprisoned citizens, to protect them when they need protection, we will be disgraced.

The SPEAKER. The rule is as follows:

"It is an invariable practice to permit a member, upon the expiration of the morning hour, to take the floor even though another may be occupying it, to make the motion to proceed to business on the Speaker's table."

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask unanimous consent to be allowed to take the floor.

The SPEAKER. It is not debatable.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to withdraw his motion. I ask it as a favor to American citizens who are suffering abroad.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. How long does the gentleman desire?

Mr. ROBINSON. I will take any time from ten minutes up.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. How much time do you want?

Mr. ROBINSON. Perhaps thirty or forty minutes. I will take any time that you may allow to those who are suffering abroad.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Does the gentleman object, or does any gentleman object, to taking up the joint resolution to which I have referred?

Mr. ROBINSON. I have never objected to anything. If the gentleman had asked me to yield to him the floor to take up a resolution I would have done so.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate joint resolution No. 175, relative to the recent contract for stationery for the Department of the Interior.

Mr. MUGEN. I object.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to go to the business upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. SCHENCK. I understood the gentleman from New York had the floor and was about to proceed with his remarks when I made the announcement I did. I was aware it was proper we should before long clear the Speaker's table, and not wishing to disturb the gentleman from New York in making his remarks at a time when business was not pressing, I thought it due to the House and to the members interested in bills upon the Speaker's table to give notice of the time when the motion would be made to proceed to business upon the Speaker's table. It was a mere matter of courtesy to gentlemen all round the House, so that they should have notice of this motion.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois insist on his motion?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do. I wish to get at this joint resolution and to pass it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. What is the relative position of that joint resolution; how many are there before it?

The SPEAKER. There are twelve in advance of it.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 50, noes 60.

Mr. FARNSWORTH demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the House refused to proceed to the business upon the Speaker's table.

RIGHTS OF AMERICAN CITIZENS ABROAD.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask leave to submit my remarks now.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. How long?

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not think I ought to be restricted.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I give notice after the gentleman from New York concludes I will renew my motion.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I hope it will be the understanding that no further business is to be done this evening.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, I propose to renew the following resolution which I submitted yesterday:

Be it resolved by this House, That the President of the United States be requested to inform this House what correspondence, if any, in addition to the dispatch of the Secretary of State to Mr. Moran, our acting chargé d'affaires in London, furnished by him June 22, 1868, in answer to the resolution of this House of June 15, 1868, has taken place, and to furnish to this House copies of any such correspondence for the immediate action of Congress.

Mr. Speaker, on the 15th of June, 1868, I had the honor of offering a resolution, which was adopted by this House, "requesting the President to take such measures as shall appear proper to secure the release from imprisonment of Messrs. Warren and Costello, convicted and sentenced in Great Britain for words and acts spoken and done in this country, by ignoring our naturalization laws, and to take such other measures as will secure their return to our flag with such ceremonies as are appropriate to the occasion." The President referred the resolution to the Secretary of State, and Mr. Seward wrote a dispatch to Mr. Moran, our acting chargé d'affaires at the English Court, which was on the 22d of June, 1868, transmitted by the President to this House, and which was communicated to Lord Stanley by Mr. Moran on the 9th of July, 1868. This dispatch states that the correspondence of the legation of the United States at London is full of remonstrances and expostulations, which by the President's direction he had addressed to her majesty's Government, against the imprisonment of Messrs. Warren and Costello. Mark you, Mr. Speaker, our legation at London was full of correspondence ten months ago on this subject, and England was as undisturbed over them as a summer morning, and we seemed then, and seem now, perfectly contented with the situation, though a whole legation full of correspondence lay unnoticed and despised in the waste baskets of British diplomacy.

Mr. Seward, in this dispatch, also calls attention to the resolution of this House of the 16th of June, and also to the passage through this House of the bill for the protection of American citizens, including the wholesome reprisal clause so unfortunately struck out by the Senate. To this dispatch Lord Stanley, on the 28th of July, 1868, writes an answer, which the Daily Chronicle of this city, of the date of September 4, 1868, copies from the English papers, addressed to Mr. Thornton, the English minister here, to be read to Mr. Seward, with whom a copy is ordered to be left, in which answer Lord Stanley takes exception to the allegations in our resolution, and denies that Messrs. Warren and Costello were sentenced for words spoken and acts committed in the United States.

Now, then, either this House, misled by me in the wording of the resolution which I offered, and which this House unanimously adopted, or my Lord Stanley is—to use the mildest phrase—in error. We assert, and he denies that these two men were convicted and are now suffering imprisonment for words and acts uttered and done in the United States; and I contend here that every day that outrage continues to be perpetrated on two of our most worthy citizens, whose blood is on our battle fields, without demand for their liberation, we suffer ineffable disgrace in the eyes of mankind.

It so happens that we have the official report of the trial of Warren, obtained from the British authorities in Ireland, and forwarded to our State Department by our minister, Mr. Adams, and published in the voluminous correspondence sent to this House by the President February 10, 1868, in answer to another resolution which I had previously offered, and which was adopted November 25, 1867. It will be found in part one of that correspondence, commencing at page 217, and is entitled "Report of the trial of John Warren for treason-felony, at the county Dublin commission held at the court-house, Green street, Dublin, commencing the 30th October, 1867, reported for the Crown by William G. Chamney, esq., barrister at law."

I shall quote from this official copy facts which will settle the question of veracity between this House and Lord Stanley, and will give the original official pages of the British report, preserved in the correspondence published by this House.

On arraignment the prisoner the clerk of the Crown said:

"You stand indicted that you on the 1st day of March" * * * "feloniously and wickedly did compass and intend to deprive and depose our lady the queen," &c.—Page 6.

Now, the entire evidence given in this official report of the trial shows that at that date, and until April 12, 1867, John Warren was in the United States.

From page 6 to page 19, both inclusive, the report is taken up with a lengthened argument between the court and the lawyers on both sides, whether Warren, being a naturalized citizen of the United States, was an alien in Great Britain, and therefore entitled to a jury de medietate linguæ, or whether he still owed allegiance to the queen (wherever he might be) in defiance of our naturalization laws declaring otherwise, and therefore liable to be tried for his acts and words done or said abroad when he returned to the jurisdiction of his original ruler or sovereign. After numerous technical objections the able counsel of Mr. Warren finally put in the following plea:

"And thereupon the said John Warren says that he was born in Cork, in Ireland, of Irish parents, and under the allegiance of his late majesty King William IV. and that he is a citizen of the United States of America and has been such citizen of the United States of America from the 1st day of October, in the year of our Lord 1866, and still is a citizen of the said United States of America. And he says by reason of the premises, and not otherwise, that he is an alien, and he prays the writ of our said lady, the queen, to cause to come here twelve good and lawful men of said country by whom the truth of the matter may be better known, and who are of no affinity to the said John Warren, to recognize upon their oaths and inquire whether the said John Warren be guilty of the felonies in the said indictment above specified, or either or any of them, or not guilty, and so forth, whereof one half to be of natives and the other half to be of aliens, to wit, born in the said United States of America, under the allegiance of the said United States of America, to try the issue of said plea."—Page 15.

This plea, that he had thrown off his allegiance to Great Britain by being naturalized here, was instantly and almost insolently denied by Chief Baron Pigot, Justice Keogh concurring, quoting Blackstone where that writer says that a British subject removing to foreign countries—

"Owes the same allegiance to the king of England there as at home, and twenty years hence as well as now; for it is a principle of universal law that the natural born subject of one prince cannot by any act of his own, no, not by swearing allegiance to another, put off or discharge his natural allegiance to the former."—Page 17.

And the chief baron, after further quoting from Story and Kent to sustain this doctrine as laid down by Blackstone, concludes in these words:

"I think it is desirable that they who in America formed views—I will say no more now than that—with respect to what is passing or what is expected to pass within the dominions of the Crown of England should be aware of the obligations imposed on them if they have ever been under the allegiance of the Crown of England; and how, according to the laws of England, they may be dealt with when they are found here."—Page 19.

Italicising cannot sufficiently emphasize the declaration. Had Lord Stanley read the decision of his own chief baron, who presided at Warren's trial, when he dared to question the veracity of this House in declaring in its resolution that Warren was tried for his acts done here? I might add here, further, that Warren and Nagle were prisoners together, both in every respect alike guilty or otherwise, both being off the bay of Sligo and both landing in the county of Waterford, and only that Colonel Warren's American citizenship, proved by his naturalization papers, produced in court under the seal of a court of Massachusetts, was held of no avail, and that he was liable as a British subject for acts done by others in Ireland, which, by words spoken here, he had seemed to approve, and thereby became liable immediately on his return, he could not have been tried in Dublin, but must have been sent to Sligo for trial, as Colonel Nagle was, or to Waterford, the only spot they touched, and where alone the venue lay. If my Lord Stanley had thought it worth his while to look into the trial, as officially reported for her Majesty, before questioning the veracity of this House, he would have seen that no crime was committed by Warren or any one else in the county of Dublin after his arrival there; that he had not been in the county of Dublin at all for years before his trial, except as a prisoner, and that it was only by ignoring and trampling upon our laws conferring citizenship, and holding him as still a British subject, liable at all times and in all places for his words and acts; that he was tried and convicted in Dublin for participating in an emeute in that county which occurred while he was in the United States, because, in Boston, he had expressed sentiments consonant with those uttered by parties supposed to be guilty of creating the disturbance in Dublin.

The right to a jury, in part foreigners, being denied him on the ground that he could not divest himself of allegiance to the queen, the prisoner protested as a citizen of the United States against being tried as a British subject, and added:

"I instruct my counsel to withdraw from the case, and I place it in the hands of the United States Government, which Government has now become the principal."

Noble sentiment! but misplaced confidence. That sentiment was uttered by a gallant soldier of this Republic who had a right to expect that the flag for which in so many battles he had fought and received honorable wounds would protect him from foreign trespass upon its jurisdiction. It was uttered over the trampled seal of American nationality on the 30th of October, 1867. Day by day through those four hundred days and upwards since then, from the prison gloom and felon's cell this gallant American soldier strains his eyes to see the light of those stars on his beloved flag flash through the bars of his dungeon, but all is doubt and darkness and despair. No American at home seems jealous of American rights abroad.

Again, the clerk of the Crown reads the heads of the indictment, and the only two counts of that indictment given in the report are the first, which charges some felonious acts done by the prisoner on the 1st of March, 1867, and a second, which charges some similar acts done on the 12th of April, 1867, (page 20;) and the evidence throughout the official report shows that the prisoner on both those days was thousands of miles away from Ireland, and actually in the United States.

Will my Lord Stanley please inform us why he was indicted for acts done while in the United States if they did not mean to convict and punish him therefor? And if they claim that they tried him for something done in Ireland, why did they not, as they certainly did not, mention in the indictment any act or word done or spoken by him after landing in that island?

The attorney general and the chief baron having failed to shake the prisoner from the noble stand he had taken on his American citizenship, the latter gentleman, the right Hon. Robert Richard Warren, M. P., proceeded to address the jury, stating what he expected to prove and on which he would ask for the conviction of his namesake. The statement extends over ten pages of closely-printed matter. I call attention to these singular assertions in this opening of the attorney general. In defining treason-felony, he said:

"It consists in compassing or imagining the deposition of the queen from her royal state, or compassing, imagining, or intending to levy war against the queen and manifesting such guilty intentions by open external acts, when such compassing or intentions are manifested by one who owes allegiance to the queen of the United Kingdom." * * *

"If you shall arrive at the conclusion that any one or more of the overt acts alleged in this indictment is or are truly and justly laid to the charge of the prisoner, then it necessarily follows from the proof of the overt acts to your satisfaction that the prisoner is guilty of the crime of treason-felony."—Page 22.

I have quoted this passage to show that the attorney general placed no limit to the jurisdiction in which the overt act might be committed, whether in Boston or Dublin, and to show that he did not even claim the prisoner's conviction except only on the ground that he owed allegiance to the queen, notwithstanding his naturalization in this country. You will see also that he claims conviction on proof of any overt act alleged in the indictment, and most of the overt acts alleged in the indictment occurred here. It is noticeable, in this official report, that the indictment is nowhere stated, except as referred to by the clerk of the Crown or the attorney general. The latter enumerates the counts in the indictment more fully on page 23. He says the prisoner is charged in the first and second counts of having been connected with notorious Fenian leaders. These acts were proved to have occurred in the United States.

The fifth charges attendance at Fenian meetings. This, too, only in the United States. The sixth charges embarking on a certain vessel in America, so put down as actually occurring in New York; the seventh that he sailed into Sligo bay; the eighth that he joined a treasonable conspiracy in America called the Fenian brotherhood; the tenth that he conspired to provide arms to make war against the queen—this confessedly in America; the fifteenth that he became a member of the Fenian brotherhood to overthrow the queen, and made journeys and collected moneys for this purpose—all in America; the sixteenth that he levied war in the city of Dublin—this was proved to be a fiction; and the twentieth that in Sligo bay he administered an oath to Michael Gallagher to keep some secrets, which all the witnesses testified was done by Nagle, (page 23.) Here we have as many as twenty counts indicated by the attorney general. The third, fourth, ninth, eleventh, twelfth, thirteenth, fourteenth, seventeenth, eighteenth, nineteenth, and all over twenty—if any, one half, at least—of the counts are not even mentioned in the trial. They were, perhaps, repetition or surplusage, but every one, except those failing of proof on the trial, occurred in the United States; and yet the jury were instructed to convict if only one were proved. The attorney general proceeds in these words:

"The only overt act on which I shall now make an observation is that of making war in the county of Dublin, because there will be no evidence that the prisoner personally levied war in the county of Dublin, but that charge is introduced because evidence will be given that members of the same conspiracy did levy war in the county of Dublin." * * *

"and if it shall appear to you, gentlemen, that the prisoner was a member of a conspiracy having for its object the establishment of a republic in Ireland, and that other members of the same conspiracy levied war against the queen in the county of Dublin, the prisoner himself is guilty of that levy of war."—Page 23.

"The charge against him is twofold: one is that he is a conspirator and a member of the Fenian conspiracy; and if, upon the evidence, you are satisfied of that, you are bound to find a verdict of guilty."—Page 25.

Yet Lord Stanley dares to say he was not convicted for acts done here. The attorney general then proceeds to say that a rising occurred in the city of Dublin, March 5, 1867, while Colonel Warren was in the United States, and that up to April 12, 1867, he was in New York; that he did not come near the coast of Ireland till about the 20th of May; and that he landed at Dungarvan without sword or pistol or other weapon of war, without doing any act of any kind whatever before arrest, on the 1st of June, a quarter of a year after the rising in Dublin, for which he was tried and convicted and is now suffering imprisonment.

Such is the opening of the attorney general, which went to the jury without dissent from the chief baron or his associate. The proof fell far short of the allegations in the indictment. The act charged in the seventh count that he sailed into Sligo bay, was not criminal, even if he had a hostile intent, provided he committed no overt act there, which is not alleged, except that he administered an oath; and the evidence produced by the Crown clearly proved that this act, if done at all, was done by Colonel Nagle, and for that he could not be tried in Dublin, as the attorney general acknowledges, (page 23,) and as the Government acknowledged by attempting to try Colonel Nagle in Sligo. If done at all it was done on an American vessel, and her deck was American territory and under American jurisdiction.

Daniel Buckley, an informer, proved that Warren was in New York as late as April 12, (pages 34, 35,) but he had never known Warren before that day, (page 40;) that they first sighted land May 18 or 20, (page 41;) that the oath was administered by Colonel Nagle to Gallagher; that he did not see Warren there at the time the oath was administered, (page 43;) that the vessel was under sail at the time, (page 44;) that they landed in a fishing boat, June 1, 1867, at Dungarvan. (Page 48.)

When the prisoner was asked if he wished to question the witness, he said: "I do not recognize the jurisdiction of this court at all," (page 49.)

Michael Gallagher, the pilot, proved that he boarded the vessel when she was about seven miles from land, (page 50;) that it was not the prisoner, but Nagle, that administered the oath, (pages 51, 52;) and even what evidence he did give was contradictory, as shown by the chief baron. (Pages 57, 58, 59, and 60.)

James Nolan, alias Daniel Coffey, was called as a witness, but refused to testify.

James Haughey was examined, but knew nothing of importance. (Pages 62, 63.)

Daniel Jones was examined, and knew about the same. (Page 64.)

Joseph Clarke, Richard Burke, Patrick Browne, Daniel Collins, George Jones, Andrew Roche, James Norris, Bernard Burke, James Patten, and Thomas Irwin were called and examined, but not one of them testified to any overt act by Warren except landing and being arrested.

John Joseph Corydon, the informer, proved that he met John Warren as a captain recruiting for the Union Army, (page 83;) that he knew Warren as a Fenian in 1862, when he was in the American Army, (page 83;) that Warren's conduct as a soldier and a gentleman in the American Army was very good, (page 83;) that he was a reporter on the New York press in 1855, (page 84;) and that was all he knew or testified against Mr. Warren. Not one word of any act done or word spoken out of the United States.

Francis Sheridan, a Dublin policeman, then proved the rising in Dublin March 5, 1867, (page 86,) but of course did not prove Warren as present, or acting therein, for it was acknowledged by judge and attorney general and all that he was then in the United States.

Buckley was recalled, and his contradictory evidence was exposed. (Pages 89 to 95.)

And this is the case against Warren. So lamentably did the evidence fail to sustain even the frivolous counts in the indictment that the solicitor general, after summing up, withdrew all the counts except the first, sixth, sixteenth, and twentieth. First, he was a Fenian in the United States; sixth, he embarked upon a vessel at New York; sixteenth, while in New York he committed treason-felony in Dublin. This the solicitor general, in answer to the chief baron, called the venue point, (page 102;) and twentieth, he administered an oath in Sligo bay, which all the witnesses testifying on it swore was done by Nagle, no one even pretending to have seen Warren present while Nagle was administering it, and for which, even if guilty, he could have been tried, if triable at all, by Great Britain only in the county of Sligo, but really triable only by the United States as occurring on an American vessel.

The chief baron, in charging the jury, acknowledged that in this prosecution—

"It was necessary for the Crown to establish some overt act within the county of Dublin." * * *

An overt act having been established in the county of Dublin, it is open to the Crown to establish what would constitute overt acts showing a conspiracy in any other place; and though Sligo is not in the county of Dublin, and Waterford is not in the county of Dublin, yet if the party came to Sligo and brought arms for the purpose of effecting their treasonable purposes there, conspiring there to accomplish those purposes, it will establish a case against the prisoner, provided he is also fixed with the overt act done in the county of Dublin. Gentlemen, there is not a single particle of evidence to show that the prisoner at the bar was within the county or the city of Dublin or that he had any actual personal participation in what occurred at Milltown, Stepaside, or Glencullen; but if you come to the conclusion that these were the acts of his coconspirators in the Fenian confederacy, and if you come to the conclusion that the acts of levying war did take place within the county of Dublin," * * *

"the prisoner would be answerable for that act if he was then a member of the confederacy."—Pages 104, 105.

"If members of the Fenian confederation, in prosecution of the common design, attacked the three police barracks, and in so doing levied war against the queen, those were overt acts of all the persons who were then members of the confederation, wherever they were at that time."—Page 17.

Here it is plainly declared that all who attended or sympathized with Fenian meetings in Boston, New York, or Chicago, whether citizen, member of Congress, or Speaker of this House, all are triable for treason committed in Dublin. In reply to the question why sentence should not be pronounced against him, Colonel Warren made a manly speech, frequently interrupted by the chief baron, concluding as follows:

"My lord, though a very humble instrument when standing before you at this moment, my case, believe me, assumes a most remarkable and important size, and the present cases would form a great and momentous epoch in the history of these times." (Page 127.) * * *

"I have confidence in my Government that they will see justice done to me and that they will establish my right." * * *

"If America does not resent England's conduct toward me; if the only allegiance I ever acknowledged is not to be vindicated, then thirteen millions of the sons of Ireland who have lived in happiness in the United States up to this will have become the slaves of England." * * *

"Give me now, my lord, the full measure of sentence. I promise you I will live longer than the British constitution." (Pages 127, 129.)

The judge, in passing sentence, told Warren that he could not shake off his allegiance by naturalization, and when he returned he would be held to that allegiance in spite of all naturalization laws. (Page 130.)

And so, on the 16th of November, 1867, John Warren was sentenced by a British court to fifteen years' penal servitude for acts done and words spoken in the United States.

Now, after thus epitomizing the case against John Warren, I think the facts are plain enough, and there is no use in disguising them. John Warren attended meetings of the Fenian brotherhood in America, as he had a right to do, and as members of this House have done and will do. On the 12th of April, 1867, he embarked at New York on board a brigantine called the Jacmel Packet, as he had a right to do, subject to our laws alone. This brigantine sailed within sight of Ireland, off Sligo and Waterford, as she had a right to do, but did not cast anchor or touch land at any part of English or Irish territory. Of her cargo or destiny the testimony is so slight and so contradictory that very little is known; but for the sake of the argument before this House let us admit that she had arms on board, and that some of those on board, and among them John Warren, had they seen a prospect of striking a successful blow for Ireland's independence, would have landed some of those arms and might have taken a hand in the fight. Had they done so, for that, and that alone, they would have been answerable to a British tribunal.

Now, there is the whole of the case. The vessel either abandoned the landing in Ireland, if that ever was her intention, or proceeded on her voyage and returned to the United States. John Warren and some thirty others, either through stress of weather, want of food, or sickness, landed from a fishing smack near Dungarvan, in the county of Waterford, June 1, 1867, and were immediately arrested, and for some time suffered imprisonment, but were afterward in most cases liberated, as in the case of Colonel Nagle. Warren and Costello still remain in prison. They landed no arms; they took no part in any fight or emeute. They did nothing at all after they landed till arrested.

Will my Lord Stanley tell us if Warren and Costello were not convicted for words and acts spoken and done here, what the words or acts were, and where were they done or spoken? Will he name one single act or word which either of them did or spoke for which either of them was arrested, tried, convicted, and sentenced? I defy him to show in the official report one single guilty act or word alleged or proved after landing from American territory—an American deed.

We cannot permit England or any other country to trespass on our jurisdiction. No Power can maintain its self-respect in the community of nations which permits such outrages on its nationality to go unpunished and unchallenged. Now, I say here that if every word proved or even charged against Warren were true England had no jurisdiction. He could have been tried only by the United States for a violation of her neutrality laws or such other crime as might have been proved against him. We cannot permit strangers to whip our children for playing or rousing in our own lot. Ten thousand Americans may sail from New York or any other American port and cruise all round Ireland, and England, too, with any quantity of arms or any violence of intent they please, for intent is not punishable even under this very treason-felony act of Great Britain without some overt act. Some of these ten thousand men might proclaim in the streets of New York, or carry placards on their hats or breasts that they were going over to England to kill the queen and all the aristocracy. They might be accompanied to the vessel on which they embarked by processions and music, and from the decks to the masses on the dock they might proclaim their intentions; but if they only sailed round Ireland, or even if they landed from stress of weather, sickness, or even for pleasure, but committed no overt act on British soil, they could not be tried in England without trespass by England on our jurisdiction and craven cowardice from us. Ours and ours alone is the jurisdiction to try them, whether for crime or lunacy, and that jurisdiction cannot be, without disgrace, surrendered or a trespass upon it permitted by us to any foreign Power. The most that England or any country could do, even for self-preservation under these almost unimaginable proceedings, would be to watch the movements of the parties so acting, or arrest and return, but not to try or punish.

And now, sir, I wish to pay my respects to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and call the attention of this House to the conduct of that committee in hitherto refusing or neglecting to attend to this the most important question before them. On the 3d of February last, now over ten months ago, I offered the following preamble and resolution:

"Whereas Stephen J. Meany, claiming to be an American citizen, was tried in Dublin in February last; and whereas the British attorney general on that trial, as reported in the Dublin Irishman of February 23, 1867, claimed his conviction for acts done in New York; and whereas Baron Fitzgerald stated the point on his trial to be that Mr. Meany had been a member of a Fenian society in America similar to a society existing in Ireland, but proved no acts of the person himself done in Ireland, or even that he was in Ireland during any part of the period that the associations were shown to exist either in America or Ireland; and whereas said Meany was convicted and sentenced to fifteen years' imprisonment; and whereas Colonel John Warren, a citizen of the United States, tried in Dublin October 30 and 31 and November 1, 1867, claimed upon said trial a mixed jury, as provided by British law, and challenged the array of the jury, which challenge was denied on the ground distinctly declared by Chief Justice Pigott, that a person born in the United Kingdom owes his allegiance to England forever, no matter where he might be; and whereas General Halpin, Augustus Costello, and other American citizens were denied the jury allowed by British law to every person exempt from allegiance to the British Crown; and whereas William J. Nagle, a native-American citizen, was on the 1st day of June, 1867, arrested with Colonel Warren and has been, without trial or conviction, held in prison for eight months, his application to be admitted to bail being refused and a speedy trial denied him; and whereas the said Colonel John Warren and William J. Nagle have petitioned this House to take such measures as may be just and necessary in their behalf; Therefore,

"Be it resolved by this House, That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, requested to institute an immediate examination into the facts alleged in the preamble hereto, and if found true to demand the immediate release of any and all American citizens charged or convicted before or by any British court for words or deeds spoken or done in the United States; to demand an immediate new trial or liberty for any American citizen denied his challenge to the array of the jury on the ground of perpetual allegiance; and to demand the immediate release of William J. Nagle, who, on the 16th of November last, in open court, both before and after trial of said Warren, after nearly six months' imprisonment, demanded and was refused a trial on the charges preferred against him; and in case of such demand being refused the President is hereby requested to order the arrest and detain in custody any subjects or citizens of Great Britain who may be found within the jurisdiction of the United States, and to withdraw all intercourse of the United States with Great Britain."

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] objected, unless some modifications were made in the wording. The gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD,] the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS,] and the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON,] objecting, or asking delays and modifications, I moved a suspension of the rules that I might introduce the foregoing resolution. I then said:

"I want this nation to say to England, upon the very threshold of this discussion, that the time is past when the British lion can trample upon American citizens with impunity. I want to tell her now that if we can get the President, the Secretary of State, and the mind of the American nation roused from the lethargy in which they now appear to slumber while our citizens are rotting in British dungeons, not for another day shall our minister remain at the Court of St. James, and no minister of England shall be received here while that Government tramples in this way upon the rights of our citizens."

"I ask this House not to sleep one night upon this matter. I say they will be unworthy of being American citizens if they will stand by and see the flag of the Union made the foot-rug of Europe."

The rules were suspended on my call for the yeas and nays by a vote of 97 yeas to 30 nays, three of the Committee on Foreign Affairs beside myself voting for the suspension and three against it, two being absent. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] then spoke in favor of referring the preamble and resolution to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, on the ground that the resolution would put the issues of peace and war into the hands of the President, and that Congress could not transfer that power to any man upon earth. I refused to yield the floor for the purpose of having it referred to the committee, believing then, as is proved now, that that would be the end of it. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] then contended that we did not know but that these men were held for crimes committed within the jurisdiction of Great Britain, but professed his willingness to interpose the whole power of the nation to shield our citizens from being held to answer for crime, either before an English tribunal or that of any sovereignty upon the globe when the crime was not committed where they were held to answer; and he acknowledged that the subject-matter of my resolution touched the peace of the Republic. And what is more important than the peace of this Republic, the honor of the Commonwealth? I quote his own language. With what emphasis, sir, would I repeat that acknowledgment of the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, now, I regret to see, absent, though informed that I would thus refer to him. This is a matter more important than peace; it touches the honor of the Commonwealth, said the gentleman from Ohio then. That honor has not since been vindicated. Every day since then that honor is tarnished by the world looking on as the heel of a tyrant crushes its iron into the neck of an American citizen and soldier for acts done beneath the flag which he fought and bled to preserve untarnished.

The gentleman from Ohio then proceeded to refer to the act of Congress of 1792 as yet unrepealed and unchallenged, providing that any citizen of the United States offending against its sovereignty, whether within our own jurisdiction or elsewhere, should be held to answer at the bar of the Republic. He also referred to the declaration of England by more than one enactment under the present sovereign that any subject offending against her sovereignty in any quarter of the world shall be held to answer before the tribunals of English justice. That sentiment I also emphasize. The crime of Warren, if he organized an expedition against the British queen or embarked upon an unlawful voyage at and from New York in an undocumented or even piratical vessel, was a crime against our sovereignty, and both by English and American law was to be tried by our courts alone. I replied that we had proof enough before us that some of our citizens, and among them Meany, who was then under sentence of fifteen years' penal servitude, but since released, had been tried, openly and avowedly so declared by the judges and the attorney generals, for acts done here. I knew these facts then as well as I do now, and so might all who chose to make themselves acquainted with them, and I stated then what seems now too near the truth, that—

"These insolent British officials seemed to calculate that men would be found here to delay the vindication of American citizens until eternity's bell should ring."

The chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, [Mr. BANKS,] whom I am glad to see in his seat, urged its reference to the committee on the ground that we could not act without an authentic copy of the record; and that it might be that I did not know the facts in the case I replied:

"I do know that the facts recited in the preamble and resolution are substantially true. I have given the authority on which the fact is stated. It is taken from a paper published in the city where the trial was held and never contradicted, as far as any reader of the public press knows."

"Now, I am not willing to refer the resolution to a committee and have it sleep there. What has been our conduct here? I called for this information in March last, within a few hours after our assembling here. But what has been done since? How long, sir, must an American citizen pine in chains and in dungeons? How long must they be kept in British prisons before we can reach some department that will listen to their cry or shed a tear of pity over the clanking of their chains? Six, nine, ten, twelve months have elapsed and these prisoners still rot in jail—one hundred American citizens, equal in intellect to the average of the men listening to me, American soldiers, without one solitary fact being alleged against some or proved against any.”

“I know that we cannot alter the British law; but I have quoted the words of Baron Fitzgerald himself in making up the minute which was taken in one of these cases from the court below to the court above, that there was no proof of any act done except coming to Ireland and having been said some months or years before to be connected with what they call the Fenian organization, and if this be true I do say here that the President and the Secretary of State and our minister in England and this Congress and this House would be derelict in their duty if, believing these facts to be true, they do not make just such a peremptory demand as I ask for here.”

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] supported me in asking for immediate action and protesting against referring the subject to the committee. I thank him for it, and I thank him now for remaining to support me again when others fail.

My colleague from the Albany district [Mr. PRUYN] and others seeming to desire time for reflection, and to inquire into the facts, I offered to let the resolution lie over till the next morning; but the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] wished to settle the question forthwith. The House refusing to adjourn, I urged that the resolution should not be referred, but that immediate action should be had upon it; that there had been ten thousand times too long and inexcusable delay. I concluded my remarks in these words:

“The chains are on the limbs of American citizens: the iron of the British despot is rusting on the bones of sovereigns superior to their sovereign—with more brain, more intellect, each one of them than their sovereign has. And while we adjourn from day to day from our comfortable seats to our plentiful meals and our soft, downy beds, these American citizens, soldiers, heroes, are insulted in every quarter of Great Britain.”

“I want something done, and I want it done now. If you refuse to adjourn let us meet this question now and put it in the power of the President to act.”

“Sir, we are all comfortable; we are eating and drinking and faring sumptuously, and swinging round the circles of fashionable frivolity, but do not seem to appreciate the fact that one hundred American citizens, unconvicted and charged with no crime, are to-day pining in cold, damp British jails, badly fed and poorly clothed, while no man is raising a hand to liberate them, or a voice to comfort them, or a cup of consolation to their quivering lips.”

“Sir, I want to show that we are in earnest; and I intend, God giving me strength, to press this subject in every way and without cessation. If I do not succeed now you will hear from me again, unless my voice or my health fail me, as they have almost failed me to-day. At the risk of both, however, I have advocated and will continue to demand prompt and energetic action.”

I then moved the previous question on the immediate passage of the resolution, but could only get twenty-nine votes. I then called for the yeas and nays on referring the resolution to the committee, declaring that it would be the end of the whole matter, but the reference was carried by a vote of eighty-one yeas to thirty-eight nays. Sick and sorrowful I left this Chamber. My indisposition and other causes prevented my attendance at the succeeding meetings of the committee, and afterward necessitated my return home; but I promised you that with God's help I should press this subject in every way and without cessation. I am here with renewed health and vigor to keep my word, and you shall know no peace till this matter is settled. I shall devise means to keep it before the House, the country, and the world till the prison bars that shut hoarsely upon these American citizens shall ring out the music of their deliverance. They shall be free. They shall come home. Their sorrowing hearts shall brighten in the light of the stars, and their blushes shall be hidden in the crimson of their flag. In recounting this story of their wrongs and the history of our delays to right them, I have no intention of blaming or offending any one; I only wish to rouse attention to the outrages over which our sensibilities seem stupefied and our manhood paralyzed.

Why, sir, notwithstanding all the declarations of my distinguished friends who insisted on having this subject referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, promising prompt action as soon as the facts were officially ascertained, I pray you to hear me when I mention as a fact patent on the records of this House that the official record of Warren's trial, published by the queen's reporter, has been officially before this House since the 10th of February last, now ten months, with Congress in session more than half of the time—technically the whole time—with that record in print and upon the desks of members, showing clearly that Warren was tried, convicted, and is suffering penal servitude for his actions beneath our flag, so ignominiously insulted in the face of mankind and in the light of this latter half of the nineteenth century.

Sir, a few months ago a colored woman was put out of a car between this city and Alexandria. That was a matter of assault and battery at best, triable and of easy remedy in any of our petty courts; but the proceedings in one House of Congress were absolutely suspended till the smallest rights of this humblest citizen of the Republic were vindicated. The very respectable colored citizen who caters for the members of this House on the floor below had received some cross look or word or treatment from some employé of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, and the wheels of that railroad, if not even the wheels of time, were threatened with an everlasting stoppage till Mr. Downing gave a certificate to the Senate that he was satisfied. It was all right to protect the rights of the humblest citizen. But, sir, when will either this House or the House at the other end of this Capitol take such vigorous measures with England as we can take with a railroad company, and refuse to let up on her until Warren or Costello sends in a certificate that he is satisfied? When shall we look for the performance of the vows of the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] concerning the “honor of the Commonwealth?” Has he read the official report, and does he still doubt that Warren was tried for acts done in the United States, and will he join me now to “interpose the whole power of the nation to shield our citizens from being held to answer for crimes not committed where they were held to answer?”

Sir, it will be in your memory that over a year ago, while speaking on this very subject, I called attention to and gave England credit for the prompt manner in which she vindicated the rights of her citizens traveling abroad. How her people were deeply moved, and her armies and navies swiftly flew to Abyssinia to avenge an insult given her in the imprisonment of her subjects by Theodoros. She avenged that insult over the ruined capital and the lifeless corpse of the sovereign who had dared to imprison, but had neither condemned nor sentenced the humblest of her citizens. When shall our armies and navies return from such a vindication of our insulted honor?

When shall we welcome back an American Napier and crown him with effulgent honors who returns to us with our national honor vindicated by rescuing from their imprisonment our citizens, even if it had to be done over the lifeless body of the sovereign and from the battered and smoking ruins of the capital of the country that dared to insult our nationality?

At the breaking out of our war many English subjects were guilty of all that was charged against Warren, yet England, when we arrested any of them, demanded their release, and we complied. Not one of the hordes of British blockade runners taken in the act were tried as Warren was; and even Lord Derby, Lord Stanley's father, then talked civis Romanus sum as volubly as George Francis Train now talks civis Americanus sum. In the State Department's publication of the diplomatic correspondence, Thirty-Seventh Congress, third session, volume one, 1862-63, commencing at page 27, will be found the following remarks in the House of Lords, reported in the London Morning Post of February 11, 1862, and sent to the State Department by Mr. Charles Francis Adams, our then minister to England, under date of February 13, 1862:

“The Earl of Carnarvon said he was anxious to ask a question of some importance of the noble earl the secretary for foreign affairs. The house would remember that on Friday last he made some remarks on the case of an Englishman in America who had been taken into custody and sent to prison under the warrant of Mr. Seward. Since Friday he had received further information in reference to similar cases, but they were, if possible, worse than the one he then mentioned. He understood that at this moment there were no less than three British subjects who had been for four or five months confined in Lafayette prison, and they had been detained there without any charge of any sort or kind having been made against them. There had been no inquiry made into their cases. An inquiry had been asked for, but it had been refused, unless they first consented to take the oath of allegiance to the Government of the United States. Now, if that were so, it was clear that those persons had been illegally arrested, illegally imprisoned, and illegally detained, and there ought not to be a moment lost before clearly understanding the present position of affairs. In these American prisons there were confined persons of every rank and means, and intelligence, and many who had been brought up in affluence—there were representatives of the liberal professions—of the bar, the press, and the judiciary.”

“The names of the British subjects were Charles Green, formerly a British merchant resident at Savannah. He went from Liverpool, and his connexion with this country had been maintained to the present time, for he had now a son residing at Liverpool. The next person was Andrew Lowe, also a British merchant residing at Savannah, and he had children now at school at Brighton.”

“Now, if these persons had broken the laws of the United States they ought to be brought to trial, and if they were found guilty then let them be sentenced according as the law directed; but if they had not broken any law then they ought not to be kept in prison for an indefinite period, and on secret charges. He understood that an inquiry would be directed into the cases of these persons, but Mr. Seward made it a preliminary condition that they should take the oath of allegiance to the Government of the United States. Now, the very fact that these persons would not do that served to show that they were British subjects. He wished to know how far the noble earl had been informed of these things, and what steps or measures he had taken to obtain redress.”

“Earl Russell said: I conclude that the noble earl has hardly read the papers which have been laid upon the table of the house by command of her Majesty; for the noble earl would there have found a correspondence between Lord Lyons and Mr. Seward, and also between her Majesty's Government and Lord Lyons, on this subject. The noble earl, in his statement, seems hardly to have taken into account the very critical circumstances in which the Government of the United States has been placed. In the spring of last year nine of the States in the scheme of confederation declared war against the Government of the United States. In such circumstances as these it is usual for all Governments to imprison upon suspicion persons whom they consider are taking part in the war against them. In a case which happened not many years ago, namely, 1848, when there was a conspiracy for the purpose of overturning the authority of her Majesty, the secretary of state applied to the other house of Parliament for authority to arrest persons on suspicion, namely, for the suspension of the habeas corpus act, and in the papers presented to Parliament at that date there were two cases in which the lord lieutenant of Ireland had ordered the arrest of two American persons; a complaint was thereupon made by the American Government, and my noble friend, (Lord Palmerston,) at that time at the head of the foreign office, replied that with regard to those persons the lord lieutenant had due information, upon which he relied, that those persons were engaged in practices tending to subvert the authority of the Crown, and were aiding practices which were being pursued in that part of the kingdom. Those persons were never brought to trial, but on that authority they were arrested. After this civil war broke out in America complaints were made by certain British subjects that they had been arrested upon suspicion. I immediately directed Lord Lyons to complain of that act as an act enforced by the sole authority of the President of the United States, and especially in regard to one of those persons there seemed very light grounds for suspicion, and I said he ought not to be detained.”

“Lord Lyons represented to me that these cases took up a very great part of his time, and he was anxious to investigate every one of them. Nor can I say that Mr. Seward has refused at any time to listen to those complaints.”

“An innocent person being arrested and confined for several days in prison was undoubtedly a great grievance, and one for which he was entitled to compensation.”

“I was not aware of the cases the noble earl would mention. But with regard to Mr. Green this is the statement he made on the 5th of September: ‘I desire no action to be taken by my friends in England in consequence of my arrest. Lord Lyons has represented my case, and it will receive investigation in due time. Meanwhile I am in the hands of the officers of this fort.’”

“But in every case where a British subject is arrested, and a reasonable case is made out for him, I shall be ready to instruct Lord Lyons to bring the case under the consideration of the Government of the United States. Lord Lyons has never been wanting in his duty. He has, I think, shown himself a vigilant British minister in the respect; and I trust your lordships will not think that these cases have been neglected by the Government of this country.”

“The Earl of Derby. The statement made by my noble friend behind me, and borne out by the noble earl opposite, is one which cannot be listened to without feelings excited in the highest degree in consequence of the treatment to which British subjects have been subjected. I am willing to admit, with the noble earl, that every allowance should be made for the circumstances and the difficulties in which the Government of the United States is placed, and the position in which they stand with regard to the civil war in which they are engaged. But I must say that the course they have pursued with respect to British subjects in America, notwithstanding the remonstrances which have been from time to time presented to them by Lord Lyons in the performance of his duty, which he appears to have pursued with great prudence, is most trying to the patience of this nation. I think he was justified in using strong language with regard to the course which has been pursued. That course was anything but in accordance with the "civis Romanus sum" doctrine of the noble lord at the head of the Government."

"I certainly do not recollect the case of any person being called on to take the oath of allegiance to the United States except one, in which there was some question with Lord Lyons, and that was the case of a gentleman who had given notice of his intention to become a citizen of the United States."

"This gentleman, who was arrested, made an appeal to the British Government, and the answer of Mr. Seward to the remonstrance addressed to him was, 'This gentleman has renounced all allegiance especially to her Majesty, Queen Victoria.' The matter was further inquired into, and it was found that Mr. Seward was wrong in his fact that this gentleman had given notice that he intended to become a citizen of the United States, and to forswear all allegiance to her Majesty, but he still remained a British subject. He had thus placed himself in a position in which he could not claim the protection of either our Government or the other."

"The Earl of Donoughmore, without entering on a discussion of the general subject, desired to have an explicit answer to one question, namely: whether the noble earl at the head of foreign affairs approved of the course which had been adopted of tendering the oath of allegiance to a British subject as a condition to his being brought to trial? He was of opinion that no greater insult could be offered to any man than to be first arrested by a foreign Government, and then be required by that Government to forswear allegiance to his own and allegiance to their's before the charge against him could be investigated. He trusted that a distinct answer to that question would be given by the noble earl."

"Earl Russell. The answer is, that so far as I know the American Government never tendered the oath of allegiance to a British subject, knowing him to be a British subject. When informed by Lord Lyons that a person arrested was a British subject, Mr. Seward once or twice replied that he was not aware of the fact, and that he would take care that the oath should not be tendered to a British subject."

"The Earl of Derby. Then it just comes to this, that he had no means of escaping from prison except by taking the oath."

"The Earl of Malmebury asked the noble earl at the head of foreign affairs whether, among the papers he had received from admirals on the American station and consuls in America, he had found any account of the actual condition of the blockade of the Confederate States?"

"He was told that Mr. Mason, who came over here, as they all know, to represent the case of the southern States, openly declared that no less than six or seven hundred ships had broken the blockade and passed in and out of the southern ports."

I quote these things to show that England, like all nations which have any self-respect, are prompt in the vindication of the rights of their citizens. I am glad always to give her credit where I can. I have no hatred toward England except for her invasion of rights of others, which she so promptly and energetically vindicates for her own subjects.

If we are dead to all sense of national honor can we not be aroused and stimulated by a bright and honorable example? It is competent to be taught our duty even by an enemy. What further can I say to rouse this House to a sense of its duty? Sir, we must meet this question, and meet it now. We must bring our children home, and that speedily. Every citizen of this Republic to whom was denied in England a trial by a jury of half foreigners, as provided in her laws, shall come home. Every citizen of this Republic, native and naturalized, unjustly deprived of liberty shall return, and shall be compensated fully and liberally. We must pay them and collect the amount from the wrongdoers. These claims are of transcendently greater importance than the Alabama claims: one is of greenbacks, gold, and such trash; the other is life, honor, self-respect, everything that makes a nation nobly grand or ignobly base. When shall the demand for their release ring out from these Halls with the immediate alternative of war? A prompt demand on the point of the nation's sword will avert war, but even at the risk of war remember that it is the honor of the Commonwealth.

Sir, I wish to emphasize the declaration that there never was a nation, ancient or modern, strong or weak, civilized or barbarian, that quietly and tamely submitted to such insults to its citizens as we have for years and are to-day quietly enduring from England. If I could so arrange it, all business and pleasure and social enjoyments should cease till we had given to England the alternative of immediately releasing our citizens imprisoned as I have described with such ceremonies as she demanded from us on returning to her Messrs. Mason and Slidell, or war with the whole power of the Commonwealth. And until this is done I shall give myself and you no peace. Every time I can get the floor I shall keep it before you till you act. I shall make privileged questions an occasion for again and again renewing it. I shall move the impeachment of everybody impeachable and to censure every one censurable till you act upon this matter or call me to account for annoying you, and then I shall welcome your censure, for I would rather be expelled from this House than remain here if these indignities are to be tamely endured; or if I find that you will not act either with me or against me, I shall move a declaration of war against England, upon which I think I can promise a vote by yeas and nays. And if this House still refuse to demand the release of Warren, Costello, and others similarly wrongfully imprisoned citizens I shall resign my seat here and refuse to become particeps criminis in this national disgrace and this shameful dereliction of public duty.

Sir, I have spoken warmly and earnestly upon this subject. Am I not excusable? Shall my excuse not be found in the sacredness of my cause? I have no desire, for I have no right, to assume any superior devotion in this or any other patriotic measure. I know that if every member here knew and saw the facts as I know and see them this House would suffer no adjournment till this national disgrace should be effaced. I would not offend any member of the House, nor speak a harsh word toward any from whom I have received so much kindness; but have I not an interest—nor superior, but equal to yours—in the honor of this country? My children with yours will rejoice in its glory or suffer under its disgrace, and if I have spoken harshly or roughly it was to rouse you to your duty. Over six months ago we declared that England was punishing American citizens for words and acts spoken and done in the United States. It has been declared here by one of our most distinguished members that if so it involves the peace, and, what is more, the honor of the Commonwealth. The facts you have in print. If they are not as I have represented, why does not this House or its proper committee say so? If they are as I have represented them, why do we delay the execution of our duty?

There is work before you, and you have the power and the means to do it. Oh, for one day of patriotic action upon this subject, with a demand for the rights of our citizens; and if war should come of it, oh for an opportunity to watch the progress of that war in which with the armies of our recently divided country united, we should forget our former strife, cease from our insane internal bickerings and our measures to oppress and injure each other, and under the united command of Grant and Lee, of Hancock and Longstreet, of Sheridan and Johnson, strike one blow, effectual for ever, for the glory of our flag and the sanctity of our citizenship.

I have been abused and misrepresented for the earnestness with which I have pressed this subject upon public attention; but there is a future, and in that future I shall stand approved, and my children will point with pleasure to the part I took, and your children will wonder that you hesitated so long to do what you must yet do—demand the immediate release of your imprisoned citizens, or summon your army and navy to sweep from the seas and vanquish on the land every power that opposes their liberation.

I now yield the remainder of my time to my colleague, [Mr. Wood.] I believe that indefinite time was given me by unanimous consent of the House; but assuming that I am to be limited to the hour, I will yield the remainder of the hour to my colleague.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. Broomall in the chair.) The hour of the gentleman will terminate in three minutes.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I concur entirely with my colleague [Mr. Robinson] in what he has said upon this question. I myself have witnessed the repeated efforts he has made to call the attention of this House to the gravity and importance of this great question. But I have at times differed with him as to the mode by which he sought to accomplish an object certainly desirable to accomplish, and one which comes home to every American citizen.

Early in 1867, after the arrest of Colonel Warren, I looked upon this as a question more directly for the executive department of the Government to take action upon. In that view of the subject I made an application to the President of the United States to interpose, not his "good offices," but his high official authority, in order that this American citizen, then in prison in Ireland, should be restored to liberty and to his country. The President entertained that proposition and brought the subject before his Cabinet, and at a Cabinet meeting the Secretary of State was directed to communicate with the then British minister, Mr. Bruce, upon that question. I myself saw a copy of the conference which was then placed upon paper between the then British minister and our Secretary of State. I saw also a copy of a telegraphic dispatch which, at the instance of the President and Secretary of State, Mr. Bruce sent to his own Government for the immediate release of Colonel Warren and General Nagle, and I have reason to believe that but for the early and untimely death of the then British minister, which took place in Massachusetts, as we all know, under circumstances very painful, his good offices, through the action of the executive department of our Government, would have effected the release of these gentlemen, and they would to-day have been at liberty. Still, I concur fully with my colleague in the judgment that both Houses of Congress have been derelict in not giving strong and emphatic expression in reference to this insult to our Government in the persons of its citizens.

Mr. ROBINSON. I now ask that my resolution may be adopted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. Broomall.) By general consent the House ordered that no business should be transacted this afternoon after the remarks of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Robinson.] The only motion that can be entertained by the Chair is a motion to adjourn.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The resolution of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Robinson] will be pending if the House now adjourns.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The resolution is not now before the House. The gentleman from New York was simply allowed to make his remarks.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I supposed the introduction of the resolution was part of the object for which the gentleman from New York obtained obtained the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The only question put to the House was whether the gentleman from New York should be allowed forty-five minutes to address the House, which time was afterward extended to one hour.

Mr. ROBINSON. Then I must call the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The only motion the Chair can entertain is to now adjourn.

Mr. ROBINSON. Then I move that the House do now adjourn. I simply wish to offer my resolution to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. NYE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 185) for the relief of William B. Whiting, a captain, formerly a commander in the Navy of the United States on the reserved list; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 1460) regulating the duties on imported copper and copper ores; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1482) to restore the Bureau of Indian Affairs to the Department of War.

DISABILITIES OF FRANKLIN J. MOSES.

Mr. ROBERTSON. If it be in order, I move to take up for consideration the bill (S. No. 658) to relieve from disabilities Franklin J. Moses, a citizen of South Carolina.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which proposes to remove all political disabilities imposed on Franklin J. Moses, a citizen of South Carolina, by reason of the third section of the fourteenth article of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I objected to the consideration of this bill the other day, because I was not advised of the facts upon which it rested. I have since been informed, from a source which entirely satisfies me, that this gentleman is deserving of this clemency, and that the loyal people of that State desire that it should be extended to him; and I have, therefore, now no objection to the passage of the bill.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I desire that the bill should pass for the following reasons: Judge Moses was a State senator in South Carolina for twenty-five consecutive years before and during the war. At the end of the war he was elected one of the circuit judges of the State. His decisions were satisfactory to both parties; so much so that upon the reassembling of the Legislature, after the passage of the reconstruction act, he was elected by a large majority chief justice of the State of South Carolina, and this by the Union men of the State. That court is in session at this time; and I may say that the ends of justice in the State of South Carolina are blocked in consequence of the court not having the proper presiding officer. I hope, therefore, that the Senate will consent to pass this bill at present without objection.

Mr. DAVIS. As the bill is short I ask for the reading of it again.

The Chief Clerk again read the bill.

Mr. DAVIS. I move as an amendment to the bill to insert after the words "South Carolina," in the fifth line, the words "and all other citizens of the State of South Carolina;" so that the bill will read:

Be it enacted, &c., (two thirds of each House concurring therein.) That all political disabilities imposed on Franklin J. Moses, a citizen of South Carolina, and all other citizens of the State of South Carolina, by reason of the third section of the fourteenth article of the Constitution of the United States, be, and the same are hereby, removed.

Mr. DRAKE. I ask for the yeas and nays on that amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas, 9, nays 44; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Ferry, McCreery, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, and Saulsbury—9.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Drake, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Howe, Kollogg, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Nye, Osborn, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Rice, Robertson, Sherman, Spencer, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Warner, Welch, Wiley, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—44.

ABSENT—Messrs. Abbott, Buckalew, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, McDonald, Morton, Pool, Ross, Sawyer, Sprague, Vickers, and Whyte—13.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. POMEROY. I believe there is a verbal alteration which should be made in the bill. As it now stands it proposes to remove all political disabilities imposed on this gentleman "by reason of the third section of the fourteenth article of the Constitution of the United States." The article referred to is not the fourteenth article of the Constitution, but the fourteenth article of the amendments to the Constitution. After the words "article of the" the words "amendments to the" should be inserted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be made, if there be no objection, it being a mere verbal alteration.

Mr. DAVIS. This bill would be more acceptable to me if the amendment which I proposed had been adopted; but as it stands I shall feel myself constrained to vote against it upon this ground: I hold that there is no fourteenth amendment to the Constitution. The proposition which purports to be the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution I hold has never been ratified by three fourths of the States, and therefore it is no part of that instrument, and gives no authority to Congress to pass any such measure.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On that question the yeas and nays must be taken, it requiring a two-thirds vote to pass the bill.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 46, nays 6; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Drake, Edmunds, Ferry, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Howe, Kellogg, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norton, Nye, Osborn, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Rice, Robertson, Ross, Sherman, Spencer, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Warner, Welch, Whyte, Willey, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—46.

NAYS—Messrs. Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Fowler, McCreery, and Saulsbury—6.

ABSENT—Messrs. Abbott, Bayard, Buckalew, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, McDonald, Pool, Sawyer, Sprague, Thayer, Tipton, Vickers, and Wade—14.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Two thirds having voted in the affirmative, the bill is passed.

HOUSE BILLS.

The following bills, received from the House of Representatives, were read twice by their titles, and ordered to lie on the table:

A bill (H. R. No. 1460) regulating the duties on imported copper and copper ores; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1482) to restore the Bureau of Indian Affairs to the Department of War.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a bill on the table which the Chair understands was not read at all at the last session. If there be no objection it may have its first and second reading now.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 1276) for the sale of the Hot Springs reservation in Arkansas was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table.

RECESS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate take a recess until one o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

At the expiration of the recess the President pro tempore resumed the chair.

THE CALENDAR.

Mr. TRUMBULL. We have had laid on our tables this morning the Calendar, and it contains some seventeen or eighteen pages of matter, various resolutions and bills and reports of committees, many of which are adverse reports, and many resolutions that now have no significance or importance. It is very desirable that the Calendar should be reduced. It is difficult to find anything upon it while it is so large, and much of this matter might as well be removed from it. I move that the Secretary be directed to place the Calendar in order, and that we dismiss from it all the matter which may not properly come under consideration at this session.

Mr. SUMNER. Matter to the striking out of which there is no objection.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Certainly; with a view to reducing the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the Calendar will be reduced in that way and those matters left off. No objection being made, it is so ordered.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

WILLIAM G. MOORE, esq., the President's Private Secretary, appeared at the bar and said:

Mr. President, I am directed by the President of the United States to deliver to the Senate a message in writing.

GEORGE C. GORHAM, esq., the Secretary of the Senate, thereupon proceeded to read the annual message of the President, and having read one fifth part of it, to the following sentence:

"One hundred millions annually are expended for the military force, a large portion of which is employed in the execution of laws both unnecessary and unconstitutional; $150,000,000 are required each year to pay the interest on the public debt; an army of tax-gatherers impoverishes the nation; and public agents, placed by Congress beyond the control of the Executive, divert from their legitimate purposes large sums of money which they collect from the people in the name of the Government"—

he was interrupted by

Mr. CONNESS. I move to dispense with the further reading of the message, and that it be printed.

Mr. DAVIS. I hope not. That is an extraordinary motion in reference to the annual message of the President. I hope it will be read through.

Mr. CONNESS. Well, Mr. President, in support of the motion I make, I undertake to say that no such message has ever been received from a President of the United States. From the commencement of its reading up to the present moment it has consisted of a tirade, including loose statements, against the Congress of the United States, and assumptive declarations touching the unconstitutionality of laws passed by Congress. In all respects it is an offensive document. Certainly time can be better employed than in hearing it read. I hope we shall dispense with its further reading.

Mr. DAVIS. It seems to me that the message has confined itself to a simple and bare statement of facts. It is no otherwise offensive, I think, than the facts make it so. I hope that the message will be read through.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore put the question on the motion to dispense with the further reading of the message, and declared that the yeas appeared to have it.

Mr. CONNESS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOWE. I did not make this motion, but I shall vote for it, and I have only a single word of explanation to urge in support of that vote. I know the Constitution requires the President to give information annually to Congress of the state of the country; but I do not think that it was intended to authorize the President of the United States to lecture the Congress; and I cannot for my life think that the language employed in this message is respectful to the body with which he is communicating. It does strike me in the light of a lecture. It does strike me as a labored effort to reproach one of the coordinate departments of the Government. I supposed that the Constitution intended simply to authorize the President to communicate such facts to the Legislature from year to year as he might become possessed of as the Executive of the nation; and it was not intended to authorize him to animadvert, in terms of reproach, at least, upon the acts of the Legislature itself. Certainly Congress must be supposed to know as well what it has done as the President can know. I know of nothing, either in the laws of the United States or in the language of the Constitution itself, which makes it obligatory upon us to sit here and hear a message read from the President any more than any other paper; and inasmuch as I do conceive that the language employed here is not respectful toward Congress, I shall vote to dispense with the reading of it. The country gets the benefit of it all the same.

Mr. WHYTE. I trust that for the sake of maintaining that respectful attention which the country demands upon the part of the legislative branch of the Government the message of the President may be read in the hearing of the Senate. He is called upon to discharge a great public duty, and in pursuance of the demand made upon him by the Constitution of the United States he seeks to give information to the Senate and the House of Representatives of the state of the country. He may use language strong in its character, as Senators often in the discussion of subjects before the Senate may use; he may use language that may be irritating in its character; but, nevertheless, he occupies the high and exalted position of the President of the United States; he is communicating, in the discharge of his duty, that which he conceives ought to be communicated to this, a coordinate branch of the Government; and I trust that at this, the beginning of a new session, or a continued session of Congress, we may have a cordiality in sentiment, or at least a respectful attention to the views and sentiments of those who may differ with regard to the manner in which the Government should be conducted. I trust, sir, that the motion made by the Senator from California may not prevail.

Mr. WILSON. I think the message is disrespectful and untruthful. There cannot be a doubt about the one or the other. But it is the last annual message of a public officer whom the people have condemned all along, and have most emphatically condemned at this time. The issue between him and the Congress of the United States has been pronounced upon by the American people, and there is no appeal from it. This message is the utterance of a disappointed, bad man, who has disturbed the country, and who has been condemned by not only those who were politically associated with him and rejected by them, but has been condemned by the American people; and there is no question about it that the verdict of history will be against him. But he has sent in his message here, and I think we had better have it read, and proceed as we ordinarily do on such occasions. I have no anxiety about the judgment of the American people as between the Congress of the United States and Andrew Johnson, and therefore I think we had better proceed as we usually do in the matter.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think if the President of the United States desired to secure a universal reading of this document by the people he would desire the success of the motion made by the gentleman from California. The proposition is, that the President of the United States, in the discharge of his constitutional duties, shall not be allowed to discuss the conduct of Congress; and when Congress says that to the country it will secure the universal reading of the President's views upon the subject. I say, Mr. President, that in my judgment it is not disrespectful to Congress to question either the wisdom or the policy that it has adopted, or the constitutionality of its measures, as a basis of recommendation for legislative reform. If the President of the United States feels that the legislation heretofore is unfortunate to the country, or in violation of the provisions of the Constitution, it is not only his right, but it becomes his duty, in communicating annually to Congress, to express his views upon the subject.

Now, sir, the President is discussing a question of great interest to the people—a question upon which the people are feeling deeply at this time—the question of the public expenditures. He has stated the enormous sums that are being expended. Does any Senator say that that statement is not correct? If the President be in error in regard to the amounts, that, of course, is a proper subject of discussion in the future; but error on the part of the President in the statement of amounts, as he gets them from the Departments, is certainly not a reason for the rejection of the document. The President is going on, at the very point in the message at which this motion is made, to discuss questions of reform, retrenchment, and a return to economy. These are proper subjects for the President's discussion, proper subjects for the Congress of the United States to consider, proper subjects for the people to hear from the President upon, and proper subjects for the people to hear from Congress upon. I do not think that the dignity of the office or respect to the present Chief Magistrate is involved in this message. The adoption of this motion will be the expression by Congress of an unnecessary sensitiveness on its own part when its conduct becomes the subject of criticism. No great body shields itself from public responsibility by showing an excessive degree of sensitiveness when its conduct is questioned.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana is a little in error when he attributes the motion that I made to sensitiveness at the discussion of the topics contained in the discussion proposed by the President.

We can well afford to "let the galled jade wince" for "our withers are unwrung." If the motion that I made can result in what the Senator has told us, I should be more than satisfied, and be willing, as I really am, with the consent of the Senate, to withdraw the motion now, namely, that the message should secure a wider reading by reason of this motion than otherwise; for to read it will be enough for its condemnation. A President of the United States has no right, under the constitutional requirement that he shall communicate with the legislative department of the Government, to offensively thrust language and opinions before them. In this document, as in preceding ones, the President has taken that course; this being, as I think, the most offensive that has ever yet been presented.

I was about to rise, agreeing with my friend, the Senator from Massachusetts, to withdraw the motion that I had made, with the consent of the Senate. I did not think the opportunity that was given by this extraordinary message should be allowed to pass without noting its offensiveness. And now, sir, if the Senate will consent, I withdraw the motion I made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion will be withdrawn, unless there be objection.

Mr. CAMERON. If the motion be withdrawn, I presume I can renew it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly. Mr. CAMERON. I do not think the President has any right to come here and lecture the Congress of the United States. So far as I have been able to look at the message, I think it is an entire misstatement of facts, and in it the President is endeavoring to make a false impression upon the public mind. It is not his duty to lecture us. It is his duty to give us such information as may be in his possession of the actual condition of the country. In my opinion he has disgraced the place he holds for nearly four years, and I do not think it is in accordance with the dignity of the Senate that we shall allow him to attempt to lecture us upon his going out. It is the last opportunity he will have of addressing from a high place the people of this country, and I am not willing that he shall make us the channels through which he shall send his untruths to the country, or make the false impression which he desires to make. I renew the motion which was made by the Senator from California; or, if that be more proper, I object to its withdrawal.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I do not agree with the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania. It is the duty of the President to send us this message, and it is our duty under the Constitution to hear it. The refusal to hear it will be regarded as a mere matter of spite, and will do the President less harm than it will do ourselves. I think the Senate will belittle itself by such action. I hope the message will be read through.

Mr. DRAKE. I confess, sir, to somewhat of surprise at the sensitiveness manifested by some gentlemen with regard to this message. A year ago the President of the United States sent to us a message very considerably more offensive in its character than this, and we sat and took it with most exemplary patience and good humor. I deemed it my duty then to introduce a resolution of censure upon the President for that message, and I addressed the Senate in support of that resolution, but I could get no response here; and I do not see now that we should manifest more sensitiveness than we did then. On the contrary, I think we have rather got used to Executive kicks, and it is hardly worth while, when the last one is given, that we should turn round and resent it. I think that the time was a year ago to have begun the resentment. I am in favor of having this message read. I do not see that we are to be any more insulted than we have been heretofore, when we tamely bore it.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] states that it was the duty of the President, under the Constitution, to send us this message, and he adds to that the statement that it is the duty of the Senate, under the Constitution, to hear this message. I am obliged, with great deference to the Senator, to differ from both those statements. I do not conceive that it was the duty, or the privilege of the President even, under the Constitution, to send us this message. It is his duty, under the Constitution, to send us a message annually, communicating to us such facts as he becomes possessed of as the Executive of the nation, and which he may suppose the Congress is not possessed of. The language to which I object is not language employed in communicating to us facts, but it is communicating to us opinions upon subjects touching which we have all the facts that he has, and are supposed by the Constitution to be as capable of forming opinions upon as he himself. But whatever may be the subject-matter of the message, or whatever may be the terms employed in it, I humbly conceive that there is nothing in the Constitution which requires the Senate to sit and hear any message read, however respectful it may be. It has been the habit of the Senate, because it has been its experience that only respectful messages have been sent, to sit and listen to them; and a very respectful habit it is, and one that I should not care to see dispensed with so long as the Executive preserves the habit of sending here only respectful messages.

The Senator from Missouri says that we had occasion to resent a message a year ago. Perhaps so. I think so. I did not hear that message read, and was not in the Senate when it was read, nor in the country. I should not, perhaps, have ventured to make the motion now before the Senate myself. Being made, I support it. The Senator from Massachusetts, on the contrary, opposes it for the most extraordinary reasons that I think were ever urged in the world. Conceding that the language employed is both disrespectful and untruthful, he still insists upon the Senate sitting here and listening to that which is disrespectful and untruthful. I do humbly conceive that the Senate can be better employed.

If any one on this floor or elsewhere supposes that I object to the reading of this message here because I think the refusal to hear it read will be calculated to prevent its being read by the country he strangely mistakes me and my motives. I have not the slightest objection to the country's hearing this message. I desire that it shall be printed and go to the country as an expression of the views still animating the President of the United States. But I do not think we are obliged to sit here in our places and hear such statements as this before us read, coming from the President, the bold declaration that—

If the Senator from Indiana will find in the Constitution a clause which obliges us to sit here and listen to language of this kind, unless it be urged by a Senator on this floor, when of course we must hear it, and have heard it perhaps too many times; but when it is sent to us in a written communication from the Executive, if he can find the clause in the Constitution which obliges us to sit here and have it read by our officers, I will submit to the Constitution, as I always do; but I think it will trouble him to find any such clause.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move, or shall in a moment, that the Senate adjourn. The business of the Senate will be facilitated, I may say, inasmuch as we are without committees at this time, by an early adjournment to-day, and this question about the message can be taken up to-morrow. I move, therefore, that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 26, noes 22; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, December 9, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

DISABILITIES OF FRANKLIN J. MOSES.

Mr. PAINE, from the Committee on Reconstruction, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1484) to relieve from disabilities Franklin J. Moses, of South Carolina; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. PAINE. I am instructed by the Committee on Reconstruction to ask that this bill be put on its passage now, and after a brief explanation I shall ask the previous question. Mr. Moses has been lately elected chief justice of the State of South Carolina. He was for twenty-five years a member of the senate of that State before and during the rebellion. Since the rebellion he has been president of the senate and a judge of the circuit court. The law under which he was appointed chief justice required him to qualify within thirty days from the date of his appointment. He was unable to do so because Congress has not been in session for business since July last. By a special act of the Legislature of South Carolina, the time within which he might qualify was extended for five months. That time will expire on the 29th day of this month, so that this bill, in order to be of any avail to him and the State of South Carolina, must be passed at once. The removal of disabilities in this case is recommended unanimously by the senate of South Carolina, and, I believe, by all the members of the lower house of the Legislature of that State. I submit that recommendation, to be printed as a part of the record in this case; and I also present, for the same purpose, a letter of Major General Canby to General Grant, and a letter of the Governor of South Carolina, both recommending the relief of Mr. Moses from his disabilities.

The documents are as follows:

Respectfully submitted to the General of the Army:

The writer was one of the judges of the court of common pleas and general sessions of the State of South Carolina, and has lately been elected by the Legislature chief justice of the supreme court of that State under the new constitution. Judge Moses was one of the first to accept the conditions of the acts of reconstruction and to act under them, and soon after they went into operation he united with Judges Glover and Aldrich, of the same court, in making some practical suggestions in relation to the jury system established by General Orders No. 32, of May 30, 1867. The last-named gentleman subsequently changed his course, but the two former continued to act consistently. The election by the Legislature to the highest judicial office of the State is regarded as a conclusive expression of the wishes of the people of South Carolina; but it is proper that I should add that Judge Moses's course, official and personal, was of material aid to me as commander of the district.

EDW. CANBY,
Brevet Major General United States Army.
WASHINGTON, D. C., November 9, 1868.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT.

COLUMBIA, SOUTH CAROLINA, November 27, 1868.
DEAR SIR: It is with great pleasure that I avail myself of this opportunity of recommending the removal of your political disabilities by the Congress of the United States. I trust that speedy favorable action may be taken by that body, so that you may be enabled to take the seat in the court now sitting, to which the Legislature elected you.

While Assistant Commissioner of Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands I had full opportunity of knowing your earnest endeavors to carry out the reconstruction acts of Congress, and as a judge of the old bench, under the pressure of a strong public opinion against it, enforcing fearlessly the orders of Generals Sickles and Canby in relation to the changes in the selection of jurors. Your whole course has been to sustain by your words and example the policy and wisdom of Congress as expressed in their acts, of such great consequence to the whole country.

I have not referred to your eminent position as a lawyer, or your high character as a judge under the old constitution. The election by the Legislature to the highest place on the judiciary under the new is the best acknowledgment of your ability, patriotism, and high reputation.

Trusting that your disabilities will be at once removed, I am respectfully and truly yours,

ROBERT K. SCOTT,

Governor of South Carolina.
Hon. F. J. MOSES, Chief Justice-elect of Supreme Court of South Carolina.

I will add that the Committee on Reconstruction are unanimous in recommending the passage of this bill. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question being taken on the passage of the bill,

The SPEAKER said: In the opinion of the Chair two thirds have voted in the affirmative.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I suggest whether the Journal ought not to show affirmatively that two thirds have voted in the affirmative?

The SPEAKER. The Chair states it as his opinion that two thirds have voted in the affirmative. If that statement is not challenged by some member demanding a count it will be recorded in the Globe that two thirds have voted in the affirmative, in the same way as on a question of suspending the rules.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The question I raise is, whether the Journal ought not to show affirmatively that two thirds have voted in favor of the passage of the bill.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The Journal will show it.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The Globe will show it, but the Journal will not.

The SPEAKER. The Journal, as well as the Globe, will state the fact. There is only one question, the question of repassing a bill over a presidential veto, on which the yeas and nays are required by the Constitution to be entered on the Journal. No such requirement is embraced in the fourteenth article of the constitutional amendments, under which the House is now acting. In the opinion of the Chair two thirds have voted in the affirmative, and the bill has passed.

Mr. PAINE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. BARNES asked and obtained leave of absence till Tuesday next.

COMPLETION OF PROVIDENCE HOSPITAL.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Surgeon General of the United States Army, transmitting a report of the expenditures to December 1, 1868, for the completion of Providence Hospital; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

SALE OF STEAMER ATLANTIC.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hold in my hand a joint resolution directing the sale of the steamer Atlantic. This resolution, which I endeavored to get passed just before the adjournment of the last session, is a matter in which the public interest is involved to the extent of several thousand dollars. I ask that it may be read; and if there should be no objection I shall ask that it be put on its passage.

The joint resolution was read at length. It relates to a chattel mortgage made between the Secretary of the Navy and the assignees of the Collins contract to secure the repayment or refunding the amount of the annual compensation of the ships Atlantic and Pacific, which contract was sold to Prosper M. Wetmore in trust. The deed being still binding on the Atlantic, and a large amount being still due for expenses in executing the trust, it is therefore resolved that the Secretary of the Navy be directed to cause the trustee named in the deed of mortgage to sell, without delay and in accordance with the terms of said mortgage, said steamer Atlantic, now lying in the port of New York, and to finally close up the said trust and report the same to Congress.

There being no objection, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 372) was read a first, second, and third time, and passed.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SESSION.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I desire to make a statement from the Committee on Appropriations, which may be of interest to the House, touching the business of the session, and further in regard to the probable length of time we can take for a recess.

Mr. ROBINSON. There is a matter pending, simply to pass a resolution which I offered last evening. I do not wish to say anything more upon it, nor does any one else, I believe. It is simply a resolution of inquiry.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not; I only wanted to have the resolution acted upon.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I desire, in the first place, to say that the estimates upon which the Committee on Appropriations will have to act will not reach the Speaker of the House till the last of this week or the first of next—at any rate not in season for the committee to perfect any bill before the time when both branches of Congress usually take their recess. There are some ten appropriation bills which we will have to consider, namely, the legislative, executive, and judicial, Army, Navy, pension, Post Office, Military Academy, sundry civil, Indian, deficiencies, and the consular and diplomatic appropriation bills. If the House shall take a recess at the time which the Committee on Appropriations have directed me to indicate, I can state that a majority of the committee will be present in the city during the recess and prepared to consider and act upon the bills in committee, and nothing would probably be gained by the House by continuing in session. I am therefore instructed by the committee to say that on Thursday a week from to-morrow I shall press a resolution that on the following Monday, the 21st instant, Congress shall adjourn over till Tuesday, the 5th day of January, 1869.

Several MEMBERS. Offer it now.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Several gentlemen around me desire that the question may be settled now. If that is the judgment of the House I am willing to submit a concurrent resolution. I, however, do not desire to do so until some other gentlemen may be heard in regard to the business before the other committees.

Mr. HIGBY. I call for the regular order.

RECONSTRUCTION IN VIRGINIA.

Mr. BINGHAM. I am instructed by the Committee on Reconstruction to report a bill (H. R. No. 1485) providing for an election in Virginia, and put it on its passage.

The bill was accordingly read a first and second time. It provides that the constitution adopted by the convention which met in Richmond, Virginia, on the 3d day of December, A. D. 1867, be submitted for ratification on Wednesday, the 20th day of January, 1869, to the voters of the State of Virginia, who shall then be registered and qualified as such in compliance with the acts of Congress known as the reconstruction acts. The vote on said constitution shall be "for the constitution," or "against the constitution." The said election shall be held at the same places where the election for delegates to said convention was held, and under the regulations to be prescribed by the commanding general of the military district, and the returns made to him as directed by law.

It is provided by the second section that an election shall be held at the same time and places for members of the General Assembly, and for all State officers to be elected by the people under said Constitution; the election for State officers to be conducted under the same regulations as the election for the ratification of the constitution, and by the same persons. The returns of this election shall be in duplicate; one copy to the commanding general, and one copy to the president of said convention, who shall give certificates of election to the persons elected. The officers elected shall enter upon the duties of the offices for which they are chosen as soon as elected and qualified in compliance with the provisions of said constitution, and shall hold their respective offices for the term of years prescribed by the constitution, counting from the 1st day of January next, and until their successors are elected and qualified.

The third section provides that an election for members of the United States Congress shall be held in the congressional districts as established by said convention, one member of Congress being elected in the State at large, at the same time and places as the election for State officers; said election to be conducted by the same persons and under the same regulations before mentioned in this act; the returns to be made in the same manner provided for State officers.

By the fourth section it is provided that no person shall act either as a member of any board of registration to revise and correct the registration of voters as provided in section seven of the act of July 19, 1867, amendatory of the act of March 2, 1867, entitled "An act for the more efficient government of the rebel States," &c., or as a judge, commissioner, or other officer at any election to be held under the provisions of this act, who is a candidate for any office at the elections to be held as herein provided for.

The fifth section provides that the General Assembly elected under and by virtue of this act shall assemble at the capitol, in the city of Richmond, on Wednesday, the 10th day of February, 1869.

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire to say to the House that the bill now reported by the Reconstruction Committee is in all respects the bill which passed this House in July last, save a change of time for these elections. The time has passed provided for in the bill of July, and the elections were not held then for want of an appropriation. An appropriation was afterwards made, and the election can be held in January. This bill is, as I said before, in every particular, with the exception of the change in the time for holding the election, the bill passed by this House in July last. If there be no person who desires to discuss this question I shall call the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Ohio if this bill was debated at the time it was before the House when he indicates that it passed?

Mr. BINGHAM. My impression is that it was somewhat debated, and my impression is further that very little opposition was manifested to it from any quarter. It gives the people a very full opportunity to vote; and I desire also to say to the gentleman that I think the time is near at hand, if the people of Virginia are permitted to speak, when there will be no further complaint in that State as to the want of a local government resting on the consent of the governed.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Does the bill provide for the removal of disabilities from persons who took part in the rebellion?

Mr. BINGHAM. No; but we have introduced bills for the purpose of removing disabilities. And I will answer the gentleman further that the constitution of Virginia has, in my judgment very wisely, provided that the Legislature of the State may without any further delay remove all disabilities in so far as they exist from the laws or constitution of that State from all persons.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. But is there a removal of the disabilities which would prevent those persons who took part in the rebellion from taking part in the election or voting upon the constitution?

Mr. BINGHAM. I answer the gentleman that there is no amendment at all of the reconstruction acts in that behalf; but the gentleman will notice that the bill passed in July provided, as does this bill, for a revision of the registration, so that persons who by one cause or the other have been prevented from registering may register and vote at this election. Of course, if this bill passes none can vote in the coming election except those authorized to vote by the existing reconstruction acts.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It is utterly impossible for us on this side of the House to hear what the gentleman from Ohio is saying.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will repeat, then, very briefly, what I said in reply to the gentleman from Wisconsin, that this bill in no wise changes or affects the reconstruction acts as to the disqualification of citizens to vote in this preliminary election.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BINGHAM. Yes, sir.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The point in the bill to which I wish to call the attention of the House is the time which is fixed for this election. I do not understand that there is anything objectionable in the bill in regard to its effect on the present reconstruction laws. But the point I wish to suggest to the House is in regard to the time at which the election is to be fixed. Congress is to fix it, and this bill proposes to do it, and that is the only alteration in the bill as it is now reported. I beg leave to suggest that the committee has put the time too soon. I think the middle of January is not the proper time to hold the election, and I am opposed to that feature of the bill. I hope the gentleman will allow me to move an amendment to the bill so as to put off the election until after the 4th of March next. I would fix it for the second Tuesday in April, a time when, I trust, the loyal people of Virginia can be protected.

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire to answer the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the gentleman allow me to make an additional suggestion?

Mr. BINGHAM. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MAYNARD. In addition to the reason assigned by the gentleman from Illinois I would suggest that January is ordinarily a very inclement season of the year, and it would be very difficult, if not impracticable, to secure anything like a full vote at that time. I suggest to the gentleman that the election had better be postponed until a time when the weather will be more favorable for holding an election.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I desire the attention of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN,] if he is interested in this matter. The time named in this bill was not fixed by the committee; it is the time designated by the convention of the friends of the reconstruction measures in the State of Virginia, and it is reported here by their own committee. They are entirely satisfied that a fair election will be there had at that time, and that a result will be attained by this election which will be satisfactory to the friends of the Union everywhere in this country. And in addition to their suggestions I now desire to say to the gentlemen that certain revolutionary acts are taking place in this country which it is in the power of the people of Virginia in 1869 to do somewhat toward arresting, as they did on a memorable occasion in 1787. When there was sedition in the land then, Virginia, under the lead of wise and intelligent and patriotic men, was first of all the States in this Union to take action for such exercise of original powers on the part of the whole people of this country as would perpetuate their liberties, and, in their own language, "consolidate the union of the States."

Since the adjournment of this Congress in July last, some time in the month of September, the Legislature of Oregon, following the bad example of the Legislatures of Ohio and of New Jersey, repealed the ratification heretofore given by the people of Oregon to the fourteenth article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States. I undertake to say here to-day that there are men living in this land who will come to understand by absolute experience the positive necessity of that amendment to the Constitution of this country, if the Government is to be maintained by laws rather than by arms. It is in the power of the people of Virginia—and I desire that the people of that State shall have the opportunity of exercising that power—if this bill shall become a law as reported, and they shall act under it accordingly in January and February next, to put an end to this contest as between the States, and restore to this Congress the power, before the adjournment on the 4th of March next, to silence forever, here and everywhere, all question as to the validity of the ratification of that amendment, and as to the great question whether it is to be henceforth, until changed by the whole people, a part of the Constitution of this land to all intents and purposes. Men lately in rebellion have come to understand—and hence some of them have been before us on this subject—the necessity of this action for their own personal protection by the common law of their common country, to which they have surrendered, to which they wish to again declare their allegiance, and in support of which hereafter they desire to maintain their fealty.

I have made these remarks, Mr. Speaker, on account of what has dropped from the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN.] He knows well enough that if we postpone this election until April next, there can be no further action on this subject, so far as Congress is concerned, until some subsequent meeting of Congress, probably not until December next. What may take place in the interim during these revolutionary times—for I again say it is nothing but revolution on the part of some of the States—no man can foresee. Let the responsibility rest upon those gentlemen who propose delay, when delay is dangerous. If the people of Virginia fail to ratify the constitution proposed by their convention, then it will be the same as though this bill had not been passed. If, on the other hand, the people of Virginia do ratify that constitution, and do also ratify the fourteenth article of amendments to the Constitution of the United States, as provided by your existing laws, a great result will have been attained. And I beg leave to say advisedly, having read the constitution presented to the people of Virginia for their ratification, that from the day of the first attempt to establish republican government on this continent to this hour a more truly republican form of government has never been adopted by the people of any State. I am willing to risk it, and I ask, therefore, that the House will respond to the action of the Committee on Reconstruction—to its unanimous action, as it gives me pleasure to say—and let the people of Virginia have an opportunity to speak, and to speak at an early day.

Mr. BROOKS rose.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will yield to my colleague on the Committee on Reconstruction. Perhaps I ought not to have said what I did just now.

Mr. BROOKS. I should not have risen to say a word on this subject if the gentleman had not made that remark.

Mr. BINGHAM. I repeat that perhaps I ought not to have said it.

Mr. BROOKS. I do not wish it to be understood that we approve of everything in which we are constrained to acquiesce. I am not blind to the course of events. For example, I am conscious, sir, that the popular voice by a large majority has declared in favor of your removal from this Hall to another branch of the Government. I am not insensible to existing events. I acquiesce frequently in what I do not approve.

Mr. BINGHAM. I am thankful to the gentleman for the correction. It would have given me pain to have stood on the record as misrepresenting anything. But the gentleman is kind enough to say that he acquiesced, and that is all that I meant. I did not think there was any opposition to the measure; and, indeed, I did not think there could well be any opposition.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman allow me to inquire what he meant by saying that certain States were in revolution—"nothing less than revolution?"

Mr. BINGHAM. I thought I had made myself understood; but I will state the proposition again.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. What I wish to understand is, whether the gentleman meant to say that if the States to which this constitutional amendment was submitted should, acting according to their own judgment, reject that amendment, it would be an act of revolution?

Mr. BINGHAM. No, sir. If the gentleman had attended to my words—perhaps they were not important enough to demand his attention—he would have understood me; for I generally make myself understood. And I venture to say here now that when the question is broadly made before the American people—and if this movement goes on it will inevitably be made before that people, the only tribunal on earth that can decide it finally—whether any State that undertakes to repeal its action upon an amendment of the Constitution after the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States have ratified it, is guilty of revolutionary action, the people will, by an overwhelming majority, declare that such action is revolutionary. And to make myself fully understood, I desire to say that before the action of Oregon in September last, professing to repeal the ratification theretofore given by the people of that State, through their Legislature, to the fourteenth article of the amendments, three fourths, and more than three fourths, of the States of this Union had solemnly ratified that article, and the fact had been proclaimed by the Secretary of State. This act of ratification on the part of those Legislatures, resting upon the proposition of two thirds of the Congress of the United States, is what the Constitution itself declares to be an act of amendment of the Constitution. The subsequent action of the Congress of the United States is no part of the act of amendment. It is simply the solemn authentication, under the great seal of this country, of what the people of the country have done. It puts an end to all inquiry; it silences all challenge; it concludes all courts; it concludes everybody until the people, in the mode prescribed by the Constitution, shall hereafter reverse their own solemn action. That is what I meant. I say that Oregon, by the act to which I have referred, is guilty of revolution. Suppose that every State of the Union should imitate that bad example. It might be done in regard to not only the fourteenth article but the thirteenth, and the twelve preceding articles of amendment. That is no way to change the Constitution of the country. It is not authorized by the fundamental law.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. It is, at all events, a way to prevent a change.

Mr. BINGHAM. No, sir; it is no way to prevent a change. Such a proceeding is forbidden by the Constitution. It is an act of revolution; it is a step toward anarchy; and for one I desire to hasten such action on the part of the people of Virginia as, by the aid of this House, will result in putting an end thereafter to any further controversy about this question. That is one reason I desire to see this bill passed, and passed speedily, so that we may have an end of this strife. If the people of the United States desire to repeal that amendment, they know how to do it in the mode prescribed by the Constitution. Let them send here a Congress that will, by a two-thirds vote, propose to the Legislatures of the several States an amendment repealing the fourteenth article, and let three fourths of those Legislatures ratify the amendment. But let us at least have some decent regard to the substance as well as to the forms prescribed by the Constitution of the country. And in making this remark I cast no reflection upon any gentleman on this floor, for nothing has dropped from the lips of one of them to indicate any purpose to recommend any reverse action on the part of the Legislature of any State after three fourths of the States have solemnly ratified an amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. BINGHAM. Yes, sir.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. I wish to ask my colleague, so far as the attempted ratification of the Legislature of Ohio is concerned, whether that was a consummate act until the certificate of the Secretary of State of the United States was furnished according to law?

Mr. BINGHAM. Undoubtedly it was, if the gentleman means by that the certificate of the Secretary of State to the public at large, for the reason that the Secretary of State is but the registrar of the people of the United States speaking through Congress. What he did he did under the requirement of the act of 1818, if I recollect right, and the legislative power that conferred that authority upon him conferred it upon him as a mere registrar. What he has certified to is only an authentication of what has been done. The point I desire my colleague to notice is that the certificate of the Secretary of State under the existing law is no act toward the ratification of an amendment to the Constitution, because the Constitution of the United States concludes the whole matter. It simply declares that the presentation by way of proposition of an amendment to the Constitution by the vote of two thirds of the Congress shall be to all intents and purposes a part of the Constitution when ratified by the votes of the Legislatures of three fourths of the States of the Union. That is what the Constitution says, and that ends the argument.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. I ask my colleague whether, from the time of the ratification of the proposed amendment up to the time of the issue of the Secretary of State, under the broad seal of the United States, the whole subject of ratification is not in locus penitentie?

Mr. BINGHAM. Not at all. The point I made is—and that was the significance of my remark before—that until there is an authoritative authentication of the amendment, it may be challenged in your courts; but if it is authoritatively authenticated, either by a direct act of Congress or under the seal of existing law, no court can challenge it at all. A court can no more challenge an authenticated act—the fact, in other words, of the ratification as certified to the courts under existing law—than it can challenge the fact of an act of the Congress of the United States. The courts cannot sit in judgment upon the question at all. It is no part of their duty. It is not within their jurisdiction, and it is just precisely because of the necessity of putting an end to what is going on in this country, everybody setting himself up in judgment upon the great people and assailing the amendment to the Constitution, that I desire this action of Virginia. It will put an end to the controversy when put in connection with the subsequent action of this House. That is what I want done. I do not admit, by anything I have said, that the action of Ohio, New Jersey, and Oregon is valid. I think it is revolutionary. But I desire to put an end to these revolutionary movements and to give quiet and peace to this great people. I yield to my colleague on the committee, [Mr. FARNSWORTH,] who desires to make some remarks.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Let the gentleman from Ohio withdraw his demand for the previous question, and permit me to offer the amendment I indicated, so that the House may pass upon it.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. No previous question is now pending.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will allow the gentleman to offer his amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio is still speaking, but he has a right to demand the previous question.

Mr. BINGHAM. I allow the gentleman to offer his amendment.

The SPEAKER. The amendment to substitute the fourth Thursday in May for the time named in the bill will then be considered as pending.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I can state in one minute, I think, the reasons which control my judgment and persuade me to favor this bill. I think we ought to order an election in the State of Virginia before this Congress adjourns, so that if the constitution is not adopted, such action may be taken by Congress as may be useful in the premises. It is said to be doubtful whether the people of Virginia will adopt this constitution or not. If they do adopt the constitution it matters not whether the election is held in winter or in summer. If they do not adopt the constitution we ought to know it before Congress adjourns, in order that further legislation may be had. It is the opinion of the committees from the State of Virginia who have had this matter in charge that the people of the State will adopt the constitution by a large majority. I believe that is the prevailing opinion of the committees which have communicated with the Committee on Reconstruction of this House. This controls my judgment and convinces me that we ought to order an election during the winter. If they do not adopt the constitution, we will then take such further steps as are necessary, and which steps ought to be taken, in order to reconstruct and bring this State into its former relations with the Union. We have left it out long enough. The people there require reconstruction and order. They want peace and prosperity, and the sooner the election is held the better. This is all I desire to say upon the question.

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield now to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] for five minutes.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House to one or two facts in connection with this bill which may influence our actions, but principally as to the time of the election. By its provisions the election is to be held within twenty days of the time when, by the usage of Virginia, contracts are made for labor during the year, and when those contracts, as a means of coercing the votes of the laboring classes, are most potent. It is to be held at a season of the year when, if men will not make contracts, it is in the power of the land owners to starve them without injury to themselves. It is to be held at a time when we have no certainty at all of the coöperation of the Executive in restoring or maintaining order or punishing violence. It is to be held at a time when we have no assurance but what the scenes accompanying the late elections in Louisiana and Georgia, and of Texas, Arkansas, and Mississippi, will be reenacted.

Now, I would like to offer an amendment providing that the election shall be held on the fourth Thursday in May, the usual day of elections in Virginia. At that time if men are turned away from employment because of their votes they can live in spite of the land-owners who may attempt to control them. At that time we shall have an Executive that will support law and order. At that time we shall have the power, which we have not now, of punishing murder and riot. At that time we can insure the people of Virginia, the loyal men of Virginia, what they never yet have had, at least since 1860, a free and fair election. While I concur in all that comes from the Committee on Reconstruction in regard to the details of the bill, yet I believe, for the reasons that I have assigned, the judgment of the House will agree to a further postponement of the election. I have no special desire for one day more than another, except to get the election into the next Administration and out of the inclement season of the winter. I propose, therefore, to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] by inserting "the fourth Thursday in May," the day on which the people of Virginia, in 1861, voted an acceptance of the ordinance of secession; and there may be some significance in the anniversary.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If the gentleman will permit me, I will state that I indicated the second Tuesday in April, as being a time subsequent to the 4th of March. I do not know but that the time which the gentleman from Massachusetts suggests is a better time. I am not particular about that; but I do think that to order this election on the 20th of January is to throw the State inevitably into the hands of the other side; and there will be not a single man elected from Virginia who will not be opposed to the reconstruction acts and everything connected with them; and if the negroes should attempt to vote under all the difficulties which the gentleman from Massachusetts has stated, you will see such another scene of blood and violence and terrorism as the country witnessed with indignation in Georgia and Louisiana and Arkansas and other States. It is our duty, then, for the protection of those colored men to whom we have given the ballot, to fix the election at a time when the strong arm of a loyal Administration will protect them. I will now modify my amendment so as to make the day the "fourth Thursday in May."

Mr. BINGHAM. I now yield for a moment to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.]

Mr. KELLEY. Do I understand the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] to accept the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] as he has modified it?

Mr. BINGHAM. No. I do not accept it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio cannot accept any amendment to the bill under consideration, it having been reported from a committee.

Mr. KELLEY. Then I have a word to say, and to express a hope that the House will adopt that amendment. We need go no further than the State of Georgia, which I want to hold up as an example to this House, to learn that we here, in the name of the United States, must secure to the citizens of African descent in the States to be reconstructed their rights, or they will be withheld from them. To fix the election in Virginia at the time designated by this bill, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] has just said, would be to invite another series of massacres such as have disgraced Louisiana, Arkansas, and Texas, and another piece of political chicanery such as disgraced the partially-reconstructed State of Georgia. This election should be set at a time when the services of the colored laborer are of value to his employer; not in the winter, when they can be turned off temporarily with a threat of permanent discharge, without detriment to the interests of the employer. We should throw around them every guard that we can, and not toss them as victims before their oppressors and betrayers.

The conduct of the Republicans in the Legislature of Georgia has made me doubtful of those who claim to be the friends of reconstruction in that State; and I am glad to have this early and brief opportunity of holding up to obloquy, and as a warning to the Republicans of this House, the treachery of the Republican leaders of Georgia, in order that we may guard the freedmen of Virginia against such treachery in that State, and give them a chance to vote freely and fairly. That done, let them exercise their rights as men, and I care not, when it is of their own choice that they do it, with which political party they may act.

Mr. BINGHAM. I now yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] my colleague on the Committee on Reconstruction.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I am sorry to be obliged to confess that having ventured into Pennsylvania, evening before last, I was not able to return in season for the meeting of the Committee on Reconstruction this morning. I cannot, however, neglect to say to the House, that for the moment, without further information than I now possess, I regret that this bill has been reported.

It will be remembered that on Monday last the Committee on Reconstruction was charged to inquire into the condition of public affairs in the States of Georgia, Virginia, Mississippi, and Texas. After the experience we have had in regard to Georgia I think it would be better to defer any positive action in regard to either of the three States not now represented here until the committee has completed the inquiry with which it has been charged by the House. For myself I consider that the action we took in regard to the State of Georgia was a mistake. We have beyond all question put the loyal people of that State into the custody of the rebels. I am not inclined, after this experience, to pursue the same policy in regard to the remaining unreconstructed States until we have an assurance on which we can rely that when those States shall have been reconstructed and admitted to representation in Congress political power can be kept in the hands of the loyal people of those States.

What measures may be necessary in regard to either or all of those three States I cannot now say. But if the Committee on Reconstruction is to inquire into the condition of public affairs in those States, it is for the purpose of ascertaining whether they are fit to be represented in Congress. In my judgment that is a question which depends upon the fact whether the majority of the people there are loyal, and whether the peace can be preserved so that the loyal people of those States can exercise their political rights. Manifestly it is of no consequence that a majority of the people are loyal if that majority is to be intimidated or coerced or the expression of their will prevented.

I am very clear that nothing should be done looking to the reconstruction of these States through the action of the people until we have an Administration here which will use the powers of the Government to enable the loyal people to exercise their rights. Therefore, if pressed to a vote this morning, I am in favor of the amendment. But without knowing what considerations may have been urged upon the committee this morning, I wish they could see their way clear to ask the House to recommit the bill until these investigations have been carried so far as to enable the committee to have an opinion based upon the results of the inquiry with which the House has already charged them. I do not make any motion to recommit, but I wish that the gentleman having charge of the bill would submit such a motion.

Mr. BINGHAM resumed the floor.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HAMLIN, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed an act (S. No. 658) to relieve from disabilities Francis J. Moses, a citizen of South Carolina; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

PRESIDENT'S ANNUAL MESSAGE.

Mr. WILLIAM G. MOORE, Private Secretary of the President of the United States, being introduced, presented the annual message of the President.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM,] who holds possession of the floor, will give way and allow the message to be read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio has twenty-five minutes of his hour remaining.

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield to allow the message to be read.

The Clerk read the annual message of the President of the United States. [It will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the message be laid on the table and printed. I suppose that upon the motion to print discussion is in order; but I do not intend to avail myself of that privilege to-day, except to say—

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the motion to lay on the table would make the whole proposition undebatable. If that motion be withdrawn, the question of printing will be open for debate.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I withdraw, then, the motion to lay on the table, and make simply the motion to print. I will say to my friend from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM,] who is entitled to the floor on the bill pending when the message came in, that I propose to occupy only a moment. I desire merely to call the attention of the House and the country to that portion of the President's message on pages 11 and 12 of the pamphlet copy, in regard to the various plans proposed for the payment of the public debt. I consider the proposition there recommended by the President of the United States plain, undisguised repudiation; and, for one, I wish to take the earliest opportunity to enter my emphatic protest against it, and to denounce it as a disgrace to the country and to the Chief Magistrate who has sent in this message.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman allow me to offer a resolution?

Mr. BINGHAM. I hope we shall go on with the bill which was under consideration when this message came in.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] is entitled to the floor, and the pending motion is the motion to print the message.

Mr. BROOMALL. I ask unanimous consent to offer a resolution.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROOMALL] that he may offer his resolution.

Mr. WOOD. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM,] I believe, had the floor, and I submit that he cannot be taken from it in this manner without his consent.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order, but it is not applicable to the present case. The gentleman from Ohio was upon the floor, and could not have been taken from it without his consent, even by the President's message. But he voluntarily surrendered the floor that the message might be read, and it is now before the House.

Mr. WOOD. I rise to another point of order; and it is that the gentleman from Illinois has been using unparliamentary language which this House ought not to tolerate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York will state what language he objects to.

Mr. WOOD. The language in reference to the President's message, in which he said that it was disgraceful to the country and to him, and tending to a direct recommendation of repudiation, when the message is not susceptible of any such construction.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. Only one point of order can be received at a time. The gentleman from New York raises the point that it is not in order for the gentleman from Illinois to characterize the message of the President of the United States in the language he has. This being a country of free speech, the Chair thinks that members who have been elected to represent the people of the United States have the right to criticize the official conduct of those who are clothed with public trust, provided it is done in language not indecorous or personally offensive—a right exercised in this message in referring to Congress.

Mr. WOOD. Then the Chair overrules my point of order.

Mr. GARFIELD. The point of order I wished to raise was that the objection comes too late, as business had intervened.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, to offer the resolution he sends to the Clerk's table.

Mr. SCHENCK. Will the gentleman yield a moment to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means?

Mr. BROOMALL. As soon as my resolution is read.

Mr. SCHENCK. I wish the floor now. I wish to have read, as a part of that to which I propose to call to the attention of the House, that portion of the President's message, as printed in the pamphlet laid upon our table, to be found on pages 11 and 12 which I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Our national credit should be sacredly observed; but in making provision for our creditors we should not forget what is due to the masses of the people. It may be assumed that the holders of our securities have already received upon their bonds a larger amount than their original investment, measured by a gold standard. Upon this statement of facts it would seem but just and equitable that the six per cent. interest now paid by the Government should be applied to the reduction of the principal in semi-annual installments, which in sixteen years and eight months would liquidate the entire national debt. Six per cent. in gold would at present rates be equal to nine per cent. in currency, and equivalent to the payment of the debt one and a half time in a fraction less than seventeen years. This, in connection with all the other advantages derived from their investment, would afford to the public creditors a fair and liberal compensation for the use of their capital, and with this they should be satisfied. The lessons of the past admonish the lender that it is not well to be over anxious in exacting from the borrower rigid compliance with the letter of the bond."

Mr. BROOMALL. I cannot yield further until my resolution is read. What has been read is a part of the resolution itself. I ask that the resolution be read, and if objection be made to its introduction I will have it read as a part of my remarks.

Mr. RANDALL. I object to the introduction of the resolution.

Mr. BROOMALL. I ask that it be read as a portion of my remarks.

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I have the floor for an hour, and have the right to yield.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania objects to the introduction of the resolution.

Mr. BROOMALL. I ask that it be read as a part of my remarks, the floor having been yielded to me by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SCHENCK. Is the motion to print and lay upon the table debatable?

Mr. BROOMALL. The motion to lay upon the table has been withdrawn.

Mr. SCHENCK. The resolution is not in order to the motion to print.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has so decided.

Mr. BROOMALL. As part of my remarks its reading is in order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. And I have yielded the floor to the gentleman for that purpose. I yield to him to offer it; but if it is objected to, I then yield to him to read it as a part of his remarks.

The SPEAKER. It has been objected to; but if it relates to the President's message the gentleman can have it read as a part of his remarks.

Mr. BROOMALL. It does relate to the President's message; and I give notice I shall offer it at the earliest moment it is in order, and press its adoption.

The SPEAKER. It will be read as a part of the gentleman's remarks.

Mr. RANDALL. Is not the gentleman able to read his own remarks? I object.

Mr. ROSS. He ought not to ask the Clerk to make his remarks.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania insist on his objection?

Mr. RANDALL. I do.

The SPEAKER. The usage has been to allow the Clerk to read such papers.

Mr. RANDALL. This is an unusual proceeding altogether, and requires unusual remedies to keep gentlemen in check.

Mr. BROOMALL took a position at the Clerk's desk.

Mr. RANDALL. I rise to another point of order. The gentleman is not in his seat.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. The rule provides that a gentleman can speak from the Clerk's desk or from his own seat.

Mr. BROOMALL. If my colleague will allow me, I will let the Clerk read the resolution.

Mr. RANDALL. We have had a point of order, and the Chair has given his decision.

Mr. BROOMALL then read his resolution, as follows:

Whereas the President of the United States, in his annual message to the Fortieth Congress at its third session, says: "It may be assumed that the holders of our securities have already received upon their bonds a larger amount than their original investment, measured by a gold standard. Upon this statement of facts it would seem but just and equitable that the six per cent. interest now paid by the Government should be applied to the reduction of the principal in semi-annual installments, which in sixteen years and eight months would liquidate the entire national debt. Six per cent. in gold would at present rates be equal to nine per cent. in currency, and equivalent to the payment of the debt one and a half time in a fraction less than seventeen years. This, in connection with all the other advantages derived from their investment, would afford to the public creditors a fair and liberal compensation for the use of their capital, and with this they should be satisfied. The lessons of the past admonish the lender that it is not well to be over anxious in exacting from the borrower rigid compliance with the letter of the bond;" and whereas such sentiments, if permitted to go to the world without immediate protest, may be understood to be the sentiments of the people of the United States and their Representatives in Congress: Therefore,

Resolved, That all forms and degrees of repudiation of national indebtedness are odious to the American people. And that under no circumstances will their Representatives consent to offer the public creditor, as full compensation, a less amount of money than that which the Government contracted to pay him.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I now demand the previous question on my motion.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SCHENCK. I return my profound thanks for this privilege. I am not going to engage in any squabble here as to who shall or shall not express opinions in regard to this message, on the motion now before the House. I am glad, however, to see that, as far as yet indicated, the only earnestness seems to be developed from the intense desire of each one who has spoken to mark with proper reprobation that which this message contains on the point indicated. I rose for a purpose which these gentlemen will entirely agree with me in. I had that part of the message read with a view to state—not from any particular weight that may be given to what I may say from my position as an individual Representative of the people upon this floor, but it is possible that, having been honored with a place as chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, I ought to express my opinions decidedly on the subject—that I look upon that portion of the message as the most gross, shameless, infamous proposition to repudiate the debt of the country that I have ever yet heard impudently avowed from any quarter, unless it may possibly be in the columns of the paper of "Brick" Pomeroy, which I believe has spread before the public this morning this message in full in advance of other papers, showing possibly a kindred feeling on this subject.

There is another part of the message to which I wish to direct attention. On page 25, as it lies upon our table, will be found a paragraph reflecting on the action of Congress in terms similar to those used by the Legislature of Oregon. It is only necessary for me to recall the attention of the House to the fact that yesterday when such language came from that source we stigmatized it as slanderous, scurrilous, and indecorous. I do not know any license the President of the United States has to speak thus of our legislation that cannot as well be accorded to the Legislature of Oregon; and I therefore class them together in that reprobation which this House has already passed upon one of them.

Now, sir, I trust there will be no printing of this message. Let it take its chance in the public prints. I trust it will be merely laid upon the table as not fit to be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, or any of the committees of this House.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. That is right.

Mr. SCHENCK. I trust, also, that no gentleman will be deterred from voting against referring it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the supposition that it is necessary in order to give jurisdiction to the several committees of the House afterward when its several parts shall be referred to those committees. There is nothing in the message of which the standing committees may not obtain jurisdiction by the ordinary process of reference of petitions, bills, and resolutions to them. There is no necessity, therefore, for referring this to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the usual purpose of distribution to standing committees. There is no need of this being printed. It will go broadcast over the country, as Presidents' messages do, for what it is worth; and I therefore wish to withhold any sanction whatever, even the courtesy of printing this message, and to let it simply be laid upon the table. I hope my friend agreeing with me will let me substitute that for the other motion.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I fully agree with that part of the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio which alleges that it is unnecessary to refer this message to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, but it is necessary that the message should be printed. All the official documents of the country have to be printed to go into the official records. If the gentleman will modify his suggestion so as to lay upon the table and print the usual number of copies, with no extra copies, I think that will meet the case.

Mr. SCHENCK. It will go upon the Journal, and it seems to me that is a sufficient preservation of it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It does not go into the public documents which are deposited in the libraries of the country.

Mr. MAYNARD. It goes into the Globe.

Mr. HIGBY. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to yield to me.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I yield to the gentleman from California for a moment.

Mr. HIGBY. I cannot agree with the gentleman from Ohio. I think, whatever comes from the President of the United States, it is highly proper we should do as we have done heretofore. Let it be printed and let it go to the nation and let the people see it. I do not think it is our province to suppress anything. I agree with gentlemen in reference to what they say as to the character of the message; I have no hesitation as to that; but about one so effectually dead it seems to me we ought not to make so much parade. The last election settled that. Let the people see what we have had to contend with for the last three years. It will fully confirm all we have said of him heretofore. I think we make too many words over the message of a President whose public career has so effectually killed him.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I renew my motion to lay upon the table and print.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I demand a division of the question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded the previous question on the motion to print.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. ROSS. Is it in order to amend by moving the printing of one hundred thousand extra copies?

The SPEAKER. Not during the pendency of the previous question.

Mr. BROOKS. I rise to a point of order. If I could I would say something in reply to what has been said on the other side.

The SPEAKER. That is not a question of order.

The motion to print was agreed to.

Mr. ELDRIDGE demanded the yeas and nays on the motion to lay on the table.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 128, nays 38, not voting 55; as follows:

So the message was laid on the table.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RIGHTS OF AMERICAN CITIZENS ABROAD.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask unanimous consent to take up the resolution which I submitted yesterday, and pass it.

No objection being made, the resolution was read, considered, and agreed to, as follows:

Be it resolved by this House, That the President of the United States be requested to inform this House what correspondence, if any, in addition to the dispatch of the Secretary of State to Mr. Moran, our acting chargé d'affaires in London, furnished by him June 22, 1868, in answer to the resolution of this House of June 15, 1868, has taken place, and to furnish to this House copies of any such correspondence for the immediate action of Congress.

DISABILITIES OF FRANKLIN J. MOSES.

Mr. PAINE, by unanimous consent, moved that the House take up from the Speaker's table the bill (S. No. 658) to relieve from disabilities Franklin J. Moses, a citizen of South Carolina.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was read a first and second time.

Mr. PAINE. This being exactly the same bill that passed the House this morning, I ask that it be put on its passage.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PAINE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RECONSTRUCTION IN VIRGINIA.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1485) providing for an election in Virginia, upon which Mr. BINGHAM was entitled to the floor.

Mr. BINGHAM. It is not my purpose to delay the House long with the further discussion of the bill which I had the honor to report this morning. I desire, however, to make some reply to the objections urged by gentlemen against the passage of the bill as reported, and to state some reasons why the time for this election should not be postponed till May, as proposed by the gentleman from Illinois.

The objections that were urged against the election in January next were upon the ground that the election would not be conducted fairly by reason of a supposed unwillingness of the acting President of the United States faithfully to execute the existing law. I desire to say upon that subject that the presence of this House and of the Senate of the United States gives security to the people referred to, to wit, the freedmen. The Congress will not probably be in session in May, the time proposed by the gentleman from Illinois. I desire to say further, after due consideration, that if there be any interference with these people in the exercise of the right secured to them by our own laws and intended to be perpetuated by the constitution of Virginia, I will be ready for one to set aside whatever may be done or whatever may be pretended to be done by the people of Virginia in the way of interference with the rights of the freedmen. The whole subject, Mr. Speaker, is under the control of the Congress of the United States until it shall finally act upon what the people shall have done to restore the State to its political power in the Union. It will therefore be competent for this Congress in January, if there be any complaint as to the manner in which the election shall have been conducted, to set the whole proceeding aside.

Having said this, Mr. Speaker, I think the House ought to be satisfied that there is no danger in holding an election in January on account of the supposed interference on the part of any evil-disposed persons with the rights and privileges of freemen of any color, as secured by the existing laws of this Congress in the matter of that election.

I desire to add to what I said on reporting the bill that what has transpired in this House this morning has given great significance to the words which I uttered before, and furnished additional reason why we should give the people of Virginia an early opportunity to act upon this matter and elect a Legislature to ratify the fourteenth article of amendment to the Constitution. I stated before, Mr. Speaker, to the House, that three of the thirty States that had heretofore ratified that amendment have repealed their ratification. This reduces the number adhering to the amendment to twenty-seven, which is less than three fourths of all the States of the Union, which leaves the question open for those who undertake to give validity to these revolutionary acts of these repealing States to challenge the validity of this amendment in the courts of this country. Let Virginia speak. Let her speak in February next, as provided by this bill. Let her ratify this amendment and there is an end of the controversy. You will have restored the number of twenty-eight ratifying States, and leave no room for challenge in any quarter.

I understand gentlemen to say that in their view of the subject the three States that have repealed their ratification of the amendment had no right so to do. I agree with them in that opinion, but I do not wish to intrust this question to any court. Let Virginia, therefore, speak, and then let us see whether we cannot pass an act upon this subject that will put an end to this thing of Legislative Assemblies undertaking by their acts to repeal an amendment of the Constitution of the United States. For myself, I am ready to say, as a Representative of the people, I shall vote for a bill making it a felony for any assembly of men in any State to pass any act declaring that a ratified amendment of the Constitution is repealed. It is not one of the privileges of speech in this country to organize revolution under the forms of State legislation; and I would add to such an enactment another provision—that it shall be a felony for any assembly in any State to pass anything in the nature of an ordinance of secession, or anything in the nature of an act of nullification of the Constitution and laws of the United States. The time has come when this question must be met in this forum, and for one I am ready to meet it; but I desire that the preliminaries shall be so settled in the first place as that the advantage in this great controversy shall be clearly with the loyal and law-abiding people of this country.

As I understand the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN,] and also the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] they deem it important that the people of Virginia shall at an early day act upon the constitution which has been framed; but they think it will be safer that the people shall act upon it in May. If that be the opinion of the majority of the House I shall bow to that decision and vote for the bill as amended. I have given my own reasons to the House and to the country why I think the people of Virginia should be allowed to speak on this subject in January and to take final action in February next, while this Congress is in session, repeating here what I have already said, that if they succeed in accomplishing what is proposed and what is so much desired by all the people of the country, we will have taken a great step forward preparatory to the necessary legislation to put an end to this controversy and to these revolutionary movements touching this amendment of the Constitution.

Why, sir, if we had this question settled as it ought to be settled it would be forbidden by your fundamental law, by the judgment and consent of every man in America, to the President of the United States to send into this House or anywhere else a paper proposing to repudiate the entire interest-bearing debt of the United States. I desire to fix this question so that it shall not be challenged.

The constitution does not execute itself. I desire to enforce its provisions by penal enactments. I desire to add the voice of Virginia to the voices of the twenty-seven States that have ratified the amendment and have not repealed it, so that its ratification may be beyond all dispute or controversy. I agree with gentlemen around me that the acts of the repealing States are revolutionary and void; but I say, on the other hand, take away from the opponents of this measure any colorable excuse for challenging it. This being done, let a law be speedily enacted here making it a felony for any body of men in this country to attempt to set aside as void and inoperative, by legislative enactments, a ratified amendment of the Constitution of the United States. The proceeding that I am combating here this morning on this floor is the same in substance, differing only in form, with the act of secession passed by the Legislature or convention of the State of South Carolina in December, 1860. I desire to see an end of all this trifling with the rights of a great people, with the interests of a great people, with the security of a great people.

I believe that the people of Virginia will ratify this amendment. That being done, we will be ready to take this other step, and see whether we can put an end to this quibbling among these assemblies of conspirators in the States about the ratification of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Your President, manifestly, is of the opinion that the amendment is not a part of the Constitution, else he would not have sent to this House a message declaring that the debt of the nation should be paid by withholding the six per cent. interest and applying it semi-annually to the payment of the principal, thereby arriving at the result that at the end of sixteen years and eight months you will have extinguished your entire indebtedness. A new way, sir, of paying old debts. In that constitutional amendment is written this language:

"The validity of the public debt of the United States authorized by law, including debts incurred for payment of pensions and bounties for services in suppressing insurrection or rebellion, shall not be questioned."

I suppose it is questioned when you propose to discharge the principal by applying the interest to that purpose.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly; though my time is fast running out.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I expect the gentleman to yield to me to give briefly the reason why I cannot vote for this bill. Before I do that, however, I would like to ask the gentleman if he is not satisfied, from a hasty reading of the President's message, that he has not given the fair construction of it? I admit that the language of the message of the President is somewhat vague. But what I understand it to mean is to pay the indebtedness which is now drawing six per cent., and thereafter apply what would otherwise be the six per cent. interest to paying other portions of the indebtedness.

Mr. BINGHAM. It seems to me that the gentleman does not help the matter at all by his explanation. When words in a written paper are clear there is an end of all question as to the construction. Here is the language of the President.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The gentleman will recollect that he began the reading at the middle of the paragraph. He should take, in that connection, what the President said preceding the portion of the message incorporated in the resolution which was read.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is, "that our national credit should be sacredly observed," &c.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Yes; that is it.

Mr. BINGHAM. That was incorporated in the resolution.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Well, what was before that?

Mr. BINGHAM. I will take the whole document in connection with that statement:

"Upon this statement of facts it would seem but just and equitable that the six per cent. interest now paid by the Government should be applied to the reduction of the principal in semi-annual installments, which in sixteen years and eight months would liquidate the entire national debt."

Now, it strikes me that the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDRIDGE,] if he would take a month for considering the matter, could not more plainly state the proposition to pay off the principal of the national debt in sixteen years and eight months by using semi-annually the six per cent. interest thereon.

Mr. HIGBY. I rise to a question of order. It is not now in order to discuss the President's message, it having been laid on the table.

Mr. BINGHAM. I hope the gentleman from California [Mr. HIGBY] does not propose to become the advocate of the President in this matter. I take it that it was quite legitimate for the purpose of my argument for me, in order to convince members of the importance of the ratification of the constitutional amendment, to show that the President has here in your presence violated the amendment, which declares expressly that the validity of the national debt shall not be questioned. Here you have the President questioning the validity of the debt, and proposing to repudiate it in its entirety.

Mr. BOYER. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BINGHAM. No; not at this time. You have on the other hand a Legislative Assembly proposing to repudiate the validity of the constitutional amendment. I repeat, sir, that it is time that this Congress should take action in this matter. I agree with the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] that, as I said before when I opened this discussion, this act of repealing the ratification of the amendment was revolutionary, and therefore void; that an amendment having been ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the States could not thereafter be challenged by any State, except in the manner provided by the Constitution itself, to wit: a new amendment to be proposed by Congress and acted upon by the Legislatures of three fourths of the States.

Mr. BOYER. Will the gentleman now yield to me?

Mr. BINGHAM. Very well.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The gentleman yielded to me, I thought.

Mr. BOYER. I desire merely to state—

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I think the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] yielded the floor to me. I stated that before I proceeded with what I had to say on this bill I would propound a question to him which did not relate to this bill.

Mr. BINGHAM. I had forgotten that; I will hear the question now.

Mr. BOYER. I desire to say but a word.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. If the gentleman from Ohio will consent, I will defer what I have to say until the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BOYER] has made his statement.

Mr. BINGHAM. Very well.

Mr. BOYER. I desire to make a single remark. Notwithstanding the unfortunate nature of the language used by the President in his annual message, I think the six per cent. he alludes to is not the six per cent. which the Government pays as interest to the holders of its bonds. If gentlemen will refer back a few sentences they will perceive that an allusion is made by the President to the national banking system, by which the national bondholders are enabled, if they turn bankers, to make six per cent. in addition to the interest they receive, which, in fact, under the present national banking system as established by Congress, is a premium of six per cent. which the people pay to the national banks. I think that the President intended to recommend that the six per cent. in gold which is thus paid under our present banking law as a premium to the banks should go toward the liquidation of the national debt.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. How can he mean that when he proposes to pay off in that way the entire national debt in sixteen years?

Mr. BINGHAM. I now yield for a moment to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. JUDD.]

Mr. JUDD. As the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BOYER] is construing the message, and seems to understand it, I very much desire that he should tell me the meaning of a passage which I will read, to be found on the eleventh page of the pamphlet copy.

Mr. HIGBY. I rise to a point of order. I wish to ask the Speaker whether it is in order to take up the President's message and discuss it when the House has just laid it on the table?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman from California [Mr. HIGBY] is certainly not in earnest in his point of order.

Mr. HIGBY. I am in earnest.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the speech of the queen of Great Britain to Parliament, though not submitted to Congress at all, might be a legitimate subject for discussion here, if germane to the question under review. The fact that the President's message has been laid on the table certainly does not remove it from discussion as public matter any more than it precludes the discussion of any other public matter known to the country and to members of the House.

Mr. HIGBY. I supposed that when the document was laid on the table that was the end of it.

The SPEAKER. Any public document or the speech of any private citizen, if it were germane to the subject under debate, might be referred to in the discussions of the House, and the Chair does not see how he could prevent it.

Mr. JUDD. The sentence which I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BOYER] to explain is in these words:

"And the conclusion is becoming prevalent that the amount which it [the Government] obtained was in real money three or four hundred per cent. less than the obligations which it issued in return."

I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to explain the meaning of that passage.

Mr. BOYER. I shall not undertake to explain everything the President has said in this message, as I am not his representative, nor does the duty devolve on me to be the expounder of whatever he may utter. But I will say this—

Mr. BINGHAM. I have but a little time remaining, and I must resume the floor that I may yield, as I promised, to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDRIDGE.]

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, I should not have sought an opportunity to say a word upon this subject but for the fact that it may seem that we all acquiesce in the action of the House upon this bill. I have persistently voted against all measures of "reconstruction," and I look upon this as one of those measures. I cannot vote for it because I believe the State of Virginia to be an existing State of this Union to-day, having the same rights as any other State. I cannot vote for this proposition because it is a proposition to submit to men who are not legal voters of the State of Virginia the question what the constitution of that State shall be. I cannot vote for this proposition because it is liable to all the objections that have been urged against all the reconstruction measures of this Congress. Hence, as one of the members of this House, I cannot be considered as acquiescing in any action which proposes to submit this constitution to the people of the State of Virginia for adoption as the fundamental law of that State.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman has said about all that can be said on that side of the House against the passage of this bill.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The gentleman ought not to presume that, for we have not the opportunity to debate, and he does us injustice when he says it.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman totally mistakes the spirit of my remark. More words might be added to it, but I say that the proposition which the gentleman enunciates is the groundwork of all the hostility to this bill. He has stated it well enough. He holds that Virginia is an organized State of the Union, entitled to representation without our interference, and that no reconstruction is needed. The gentleman's statement needs no elaborate argument. The reply to that is this: the people of this country have spoken on this subject, and they have decided against the gentleman and against his party.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. They have decided against the congressional policy.

Mr. BINGHAM. They have decided against his argument.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. You could not have elected a majority here in Congress if it had not been for General Grant to draw them in.

Mr. BINGHAM. His own State has decided that question against the gentleman. The gentleman and his party made the issue that these acts of reconstruction are acts of usurpation, unconstitutional and void. The gentleman and his party went to the country upon that platform, and the people wrote in words of flame over their platform, that might be read of all men, that it was dangerous to stand upon that platform; that these acts of reconstruction were constitutional, were not revolutionary, were not usurpations, were not void, but should be enforced as the sovereign will of the people of this country. That is the verdict of the great people.

Mr. NIBLACK rose.

Mr. BINGHAM. I cannot yield, as my time is nearly out. That was the verdict of the people, and the only question which remains between my friend from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] and myself is whether this vote shall be taken in January or May. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] wishes to postpone the election to the fourth Thursday of May next. The bill, as it stands, provides that the election shall be held on the 20th of January next. I desire to remind the House that this bill passed at the last session providing for an election last spring, which was not held for want of an appropriation. That appropriation has since been made. It was then deemed wise to hold the election while Congress was in session. I adhere to that opinion now, and I say that the freedmen of Virginia during the session of Congress are more secure in holding an election than during its vacation. I hope the bill as reported will be passed, and the amendment rejected.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to insert "fourth Thursday of May" wherever reference to holding the election is made in the bill.

Mr. BINGHAM demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question first recurring on the amendment; and on a division there were—ayes 85, noes 55.

Mr. BINGHAM demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BINGHAM, and Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, were appointed. The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 75, noes 60.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The bill provides that the Legislature shall meet in February, when the election, as the bill has been amended, does not take place until May.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. That shows the importance of debating the bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I now move to amend so as to provide that the meeting of the Legislature shall be on the fourth Thursday of June.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It should be later. It should be August or September. June is a bad time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will make it the first Tuesday in September, 1869.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. BINGHAM demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. ELDRIDGE demanded the yeas and nays, and tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered; and the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The bill was passed.

Mr. BINGHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also, moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, submitting a communication from the Commissioner of the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, asking that Congress appoint a committee to investigate into the administration of the bureau; which was referred to the Committee on Freedmen's Affairs.

COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to resign my position as chairman of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I ask the gentleman to yield to me a single moment. I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill introduced yesterday to repeal the tenure-of-office act was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] yields to the gentleman from Massachusetts to make that motion he yields unconditionally, as the motion to adjourn cuts off all business.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I do not yield. I renew the motion to adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at three o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. McKEE: The petition of John Price, for a pension.

By Mr. MOORHEAD: The petition of the letter-carriers of the city of Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, asking for an increase of pay.

By Mr. SPALDING: The petition of Mrs. Helen A. M. Edwards, for a pension.

By Mr. SITGREAVES: The petition of Mary E. J. Mitchell, widow of the late Lieutenant Commander John G. Mitchell, asking Congress to grant to her and her infant child a section or more of coal land discovered by her husband, when commanding the United States steamer Saginaw, in the territory recently acquired from Russia.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, December 10, 1868.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Hon. CHARLES R. BUCKALEW, of Pennsylvania; Hon. JOHN POOL, of North Carolina; and Hon. F. A. SAWYER, of South Carolina, appeared in their seats to-day.

COMMITTEES OF THE SENATE.

Mr. ANTHONY. As the morning business has been somewhat embarrassed by the lack of the standing committees, I will, with the permission of the Senate, move to proceed to the appointment of the standing committees now, so that petitions and memorials may be referred to them as they are presented. Previous to doing so, I offer a resolution to continue one of the special committees that was appointed at the last session:

Resolved, That the committee appointed to inquire whether improper or corrupt means have been used, or attempted to be used, to influence the votes of the members of the Senate in the trial of the impeachment of the President, with power to send for persons and papers, be, and the same is hereby, reappointed.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. I now offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the joint committee appointed at the first session of the present Congress, and continued at the last session, to revise and fix the pay of the officers of the two Houses, be, and they are hereby, reappointed.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. I offer another resolution:

Resolved, That the select committee to whom were referred certain railroad bills at the last session be continued during the present session.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. As the Senate is aware, very important work is now going on for the revision of the laws, and as the reports are coming in—several chapters have been submitted already, I believe—and the Judiciary Committee is very much overburdened with work, it has been thought advisable to have a committee on the revision of the laws. I offer the following resolution for that purpose:

Resolved, That there be added to the standing committees of the Senate a committee to be called a Committee on the Revision of the Laws of the United States, to consist of five persons.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. I now move that the Senate proceed to the election of the standing committees.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. Task the unanimous consent of the Senate to suspend the rule that requires the committees to be elected by ballot, that they may be elected by nomination.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That can only be done by unanimous consent. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. ANTHONY. I nominate the committees on the list that I send to the Chair.

The Chief Clerk read the list, as follows:

Joint Committee on Retrenchment.—Messrs. Edmunds, (chairman,) Williams, Patterson of New Hampshire, and Buckalew.

Joint Committee to Revise and Fix the Pay of the Officers of the two Houses.—Messrs. Fessenden, (chairman,) Sherman, and Buckalew.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to this list of nominations as the standing committees of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RICE. I move that two members be added to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad. I will state that in the formation of that committee the South was not represented, and the number of which it is now composed is necessary for the other interests that were then represented, and hence it could not be changed so as to admit any representatives of the South. In order to do that it will be essential to increase the committee, and as there is no Senator upon that committee whose constituents are locally interested in the Southern Pacific road, I move that there be an addition of two members to that committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think it would be better, probably, to postpone the consideration of that motion until to-morrow, until this list can be printed, so that Senators may know how the committee is now constituted, and then we can consider in what manner, if at all, any addition shall be made. I hope, therefore, that my friend from Arkansas will permit his motion to go over until to-morrow.

Mr. RICE. I have no objection to that. I will submit it in the form of a resolution.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

REFERENCE OF BILLS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that several bills have been introduced at the present session, and some other business has been presented, that are now on the table awaiting the appointment of committees. If it is the pleasure of the Senate all these matters can be referred.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I make that motion, that they be referred to the proper committees.

Mr. SUMNER. There are one or two bills that I have had the honor of presenting on which I wish to make remarks, not at length, but still some brief remarks before the reference.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let those be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Clerk will read the titles of the bills, and they will be referred to the appropriate committees if no objection is made, or if there are any observations to be made upon them they can be made.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the bills by their titles. The first bill was the bill (S. No. 649) to provide for the resumption of specie payments on the 4th of July, 1869.

Mr. SUMNER. Let that stay on the Calendar for a few days. I wish at the proper time to move its reference to the Committee on Finance. I will make that motion some time next week.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will lie on the table for the present.

The bill (S. No. 650) to enforce the several provisions of the Constitution abolishing slavery, declaring the immunities of citizens, and guarantying a republican form of government by securing the elective franchise to citizens deprived of it by reason of race, color, or previous condition, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (S. No. 651) to establish a uniform rule of naturalization was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The next bill on the table was the bill (S. No. 652) to provide for the issue of arms for the use of the militia in certain States lately in rebellion.

Mr. RICE. I ask that that bill lie on the table, to be called up hereafter. It was acted upon by the Committee on Military Affairs at the last session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will lie over.

The bill (S. No. 653) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of naturalization," approved April 14, 1802, and to repeal all acts inconsistent therewith, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (S. No. 654) to regulate proceedings for the naturalization of aliens was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (S. No. 655) granting a pension to Paulina Jones, of Greene county, Tennessee, was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The bill (S. No. 656) to remove political disabilities was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (S. No. 657) to abolish the franking privilege was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

The bill (S. No. 659) to relieve from legal and political disabilities certain persons engaged in the late rebellion was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (S. No. 660) to aid in the construction of the Oregon Branch Pacific railroad was referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

The bill (S. No. 661) for the relief of Lieutenant Colonel John W. Davidson, of the United States Army, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

The joint resolution (S. R. No. 179) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The joint resolution (S. R. No. 184) for the removal of political disabilities was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The joint resolution (S. R. No. 185) for the relief of William B. Whiting, a captain, formerly a commander in the Navy of the United States on the reserved list, was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

RECONSTRUCTION IN GEORGIA.

The bill (S. No. 662) to carry out the reconstruction acts in the State of Georgia was read by its title.

Mr. SUMNER. That is a bill which I introduced yesterday, and which will naturally go to the Committee on the Judiciary; but before it is referred I desire to call attention to one of the existing reconstruction laws which seems to me to govern the case. By the reconstruction act, bearing date July 19, 1867, it is provided that "all persons hereafter elected in said military districts under any so-called State or municipal authority shall be required to take and subscribe the oath of office prescribed by law for officers of the United States." Now, in point of fact, the existing Legislature of the State of Georgia did not, as I understand, take that prescribed oath; and I submit that, failing to take that oath, the Legislature is not properly organized. It becomes, therefore, it seems to me, the duty of Congress to intervene and to assume again, to a certain extent, for the purposes of the occasion, jurisdiction in that State; and the bill which I have had the honor of laying on the table of the Senate is with that object. With this simple explanation, I move its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

SYMPATHY TO SPAIN.

The joint resolution (S. R. No. 178) tendering sympathy and best wishes to the people of Spain was read by its title.

Mr. SUMNER. If there be no objection I ask the Senate to proceed with the consideration of that resolution now.

Several SENATORS. Oh, no.

Mr. DRAKE. Let it go to a committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It had better be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SUMNER. If any Senator suggests that it should go to the committee I shall make no objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think it had better be referred to a committee. We do not know what the people of Spain are going to do yet.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

SUFFRAGE IN THE UNITED STATES.

The joint resolution (S. R. No. 180) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States was read by its title.

Mr. POMEROY. I should like to have that joint resolution lie on the table. I do not want it to go so far that we cannot reach it. If it gets to the Judiciary Committee we shall never see it again. I move that it lie upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

GRADES IN ARMY AND NAVY.

The joint resolution (S. R. No. 181) in relation to the grades of General and Lieutenant General in the Army and Admiral and Vice Admiral in the Navy was read by its title.

Mr. DRAKE. I desire to remark, in connection with that resolution at this time, that the simple object of it is, that as those offices were created as the rewards of great public services, they shall be held hereafter as such rewards through all the history of the Government, and shall not be offices open to regular promotion. I desire, too, to say that I can have no personal views in this matter with regard to any gentleman holding any one of those places, or to hold them. It is known, of course, to all that a vacancy will occur very shortly in the office of General. I wish distinctly to state that in offering this resolution I have no reference whatever to the individual who would be, of course, expected to come into that office by regular promotion. I have the honor of enjoying the friendship of that gentleman, and no one values him and his services and his friendship more highly than I do. But, sir, as in this Republic we have no rewards higher than high official position to bestow for great public services, as we have no dukedoms nor earldoms nor principalities to bestow where men have rendered great services to the country, I think it is desirable that these offices should be kept as the rewards of distinguished and preëminent public service. I make these remarks that the motives which induced me to introduce the resolution may be thus early understood. I move the reference of the resolution, first, to the Committee on Military Affairs. After it is reported upon by them, if it should be, favorably, it will be proper then to refer it to the Committee on Naval Affairs. I move its reference now to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

CLAIMS OF LOYAL SOUTHERN CITIZENS.

The joint resolution (S. R. No. 183) to extend the provisions of the act of July 4, 1864, limiting the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, to the loyal citizens of the States of Louisiana and Arkansas, was read by its title.

Mr. SPENCER. I move to amend that bill by inserting after the word "Louisiana," where ever it occurs, the word "Alabama."

Mr. EDMUNDS. I suggest to my friend from Alabama that that bill ought to go to a committee, where any amendment of that kind, and how far it shall extend, can be considered. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, where claims of that kind have generally gone.

Mr. SPENCER. I will state for the information of the gentleman that Alabama should have been put in the bill originally, in pursuance of an understanding between the Senator from Louisiana and myself.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have no objection to the amendment being made if the bill can then be referred, as I suppose it can be.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. KELLOGG. There are one or two other amendments that ought to be made, and then I shall move the reference of the bill to the appropriate committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Louisiana propose any amendment to the bill?

Mr. KELLOGG. No, sir. I merely desire to move its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

The joint resolution (S. R. No. 182) extending the operations of the Freedmen's Bureau for a limited period in certain States was read by its title.

Mr. POMEROY. I move, as I had the honor of introducing that resolution, which refers only to a temporary continuance of the bureau in Virginia, Texas, and Mississippi, and to the continuation of the Government hospitals, that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; and I hope they will make an early report upon it.

The motion was agreed to.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

Mr. DRAKE. When Senate bill No. 661 was called just now I forgot at the moment to make a motion in connection with it. In 1860 that bill was before the Senate, and there are papers in the Secretary's office that appertain to it. I move that those papers be withdrawn from the files and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, along with the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the case?

Mr. DRAKE. The case of Lieutenant Colonel John W. Davidson.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The papers will be so referred if there be no objection.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 1460) regulating the duties on imported copper and copper ores was referred to the Committee on Finance; and the bill (H. R. No. 1276) for the sale of the Hot Springs reservation in Arkansas was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

PROPOSED TRANSFER OF INDIAN BUREAU.

The bill (H. R. No. 1482) to restore the Bureau of Indian Affairs to the Department of War was read by its title.

Mr. THAYER. That should be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. WILSON. I move its reference to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first motion is that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and the question is on that motion.

The question being put, there were, on a division—ayes twenty-four.

Mr. SUMNER. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WILSON. I merely suggest that this subject has been before the Committee on Military Affairs, and that committee have reported several times in favor of this change. It has been recommended by the generals of the Army before, and by the War Department. This bill comes from the Committee on Military Affairs in the House of Representatives; it was reported by that committee, and it seems to me that it should go to the same committee in the Senate. I am not strenuous about it, but I think that is the proper place for it.

Mr. FERRY. I voted against the motion to refer to the Committee on Indian Affairs, because I believe that if that motion were to prevail it would be fatal to this bill. Favoring the bill, I should prefer its reference to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. TIPTON. I voted to refer this bill to the Committee on Indian Affairs from the fact that my constituents are very deeply interested in this question of Indian affairs; and if a revolution entire is to be made in regard to controlling the Indian affairs of the country I certainly think that the Committee on Indian Affairs, which has been so long charged with this question, is entitled to look into the matter at the last hour of the action of Congress upon the subject. I hope, therefore, that the reference will be made to the Committee on Indian Affairs. That will not preclude a future reference of the matter to the Military Committee.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. This is a subject relating to Indian affairs. You have a committee on that subject. It would therefore, I submit, seem proper that the Committee on Indian Affairs should have cognizance of this question and examine it.

The suggestion of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Wilson] does not strike me as very forcible. He says this measure has been recommended by the generals. I do not suppose that the Senate of the United States is yet quite prepared to legislate in advance upon the recommendation of the generals of the Army. I still suppose that it is competent and that it is proper for the Senate of the United States, notwithstanding the recommendation of the generals, to examine subjects that are submitted to the Senate by the proper committees; and I would say to the honorable Senator from Massachusetts that the generals have recommended both ways on this subject. The legislation might be a little inconvenient if it were to go in that way. Manifestly, Mr. President, this is an important subject, and most manifestly, I submit, it belongs to the Committee on Indian Affairs; and I do not suppose that either the recommendation of the generals or the fact that by some reason or other the bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives will control the action of the Senate. I hope, therefore, that the Senate will at least have that ordinary confidence in the committee to whom this subject properly belongs to submit it to them and hear their judgment.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. President, if the reason assigned by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. FERRY] is to govern legislation here we may as well abolish all committees at once. I am surprised to hear that a bill is not to go to its proper committee because a member may suppose that that committee may report against it or undertake to kill it. That, it seems to me, is prejudging the question. It is the rule of this body that bills shall be referred to the appropriate committees. Every bill in relation to Indian affairs has hitherto gone to the Indian Committee. Why is it to be changed now? Is there a disposition to rush this bill right through? If there is, I respectfully protest against it. I do not say, I am not prepared to say, how I may vote upon it. I have the honor to be on both committees, the Indian Committee and the Military Committee; and so I can have my say on the subject, no matter to which committee it goes. But I do object to taking a certain course of action in order to insure the passage of this bill when that action is irregular, or, at least, not in accordance with the usages of this body. I agree with my honorable friend from Maine that we are not to act in regard to this reference because a general of the Army or several of them have made recommendations on this question. I have the documents in my possession to show that the lieutenant general has opposed the transfer of this Indian Bureau to the War Department.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think myself that the Committee on Indian Affairs, under the rules, is the proper committee to which this bill should be referred; but I would have voted to refer it to the Committee on Military Affairs for a very good reason. A similar bill has been introduced for two or three years and has been referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and it has never been reported by that committee, for or against. This is a subject that is entitled to a great deal of attention, upon which we have the right to have the report of the committee to whom the measure is referred. If I can have an assurance from members of the Committee on Indian Affairs that they will report on the subject, either for the transfer or against it, I shall vote to make the ordinary reference; but it is a remarkable fact that at the last session of Congress this subject, which excited a good deal of comment and conversation, was referred to that committee and was not reported upon. One of the members of that committee, who has already spoken, says they will report upon it, for or against it. I think it ought to be referred to that committee, because it relates to Indian affairs, although my opinions concur entirely with the report already made by the Committee on Military Affairs. The mere fact that the question of the military service is involved in it is not sufficient to induce its reference to the Committee on Military Affairs, because that reason would carry to that committee all the military appropriations and a multitude of other subjects that properly go to other committees.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, I do not think that this is the proper time to express any opinions as to whether this bill ought to pass or ought not to pass. Nor is it material to inquire whether the generals of the Army have recommended it or disagreed in regard to the propriety of the passage of the bill. I shall vote upon this question, as upon all others of a similar character, according to what I believe to be the propriety of the reference. This is a bill relating to Indian affairs, contemplating a fundamental change in the administration of the Indian affairs of the country—a very important matter. We have a committee organized for the very purpose of taking charge of such matters; and because a bill has passed the House of Representatives, or is introduced here, proposing to transfer the control of Indian affairs to the Navy, or to the Army, or to the courts of the country, if you please, I do not suppose that it should go to a different committee than that which is organized for the purpose of taking charge of all matters relating to Indian transactions. I should regard it as a reflection upon the Committee on Indian Affairs, which I am not willing to make, to say that the bill will be smothered and not reported. There may have been reasons why the committee did not report on this measure at previous sessions. I was not aware of the fact that they had not done so. I recollect very well that we have had the matter in the Senate. We have had it discussed here. It has been up before the Senate, and the Senate has voted upon it. Somehow or other it has been brought to our attention. I shall not assume in advance, on the day that the committees are organized, that they will not do their duty.

I should be sorry to see the Senate so far depart from the usual mode of proceedings as to anticipate that one committee is favorable and another unfavorable to a particular measure which is proposed, and that it is to go to the hands of the friends of the measure. That seems to be assumed here. I do not know that the Committee on Military Affairs is any more friendly to this measure than the Committee on Indian Affairs, nor do I care how that may be. The Indian Committee, in my judgment, is the appropriate one to which the bill should be referred, and I hope the Senate will send it there.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I desire to say, in reference to what has been remarked by the honorable Senator from Ohio, that I have not the slightest recollection of such a bill ever having been before the Committee on Indian Affairs. It may have been, as my attention has not been constant on that committee. But I have not the slightest belief that there is, in any sense whatever, an aversion on the part of that committee to giving this subject a full and proper consideration. I say so certainly for myself, in the absence of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, during the Oregon Indian war this subject was investigated by the Committee on Military Affairs, and that committee came to the conclusion that the Indian Bureau ought to be in the War Department; that the War Department ought to have the care of Indian affairs; that millions of dollars of expense had been brought upon the country by the change that had been made by transferring the bureau to the Interior Department. Several times since the matter has been considered by that committee, and during the last four or five years they have reported two or three times on the subject. It is a well-known fact that the Indian Bureau has been very averse to this change, but it has been strongly and urgently recommended that the change should be made. Now, sir, as this bill came from the Committee on Military Affairs in the House of Representatives, I proposed that it should be referred to the same committee in the Senate. I do not desire the care of it in any way, and I am not at all strenuous as to where it shall go. It seems to me, however, that it is a matter that we should act upon. I believe that millions and tens of millions have been put upon this country by the change originally made by the transfer from the War Department to the Interior Department, and I think millions will be saved by putting it where it ought to be—in the War Department of this Government. I think a great deal of cheating and stealing, that have been disgraceful to the country, will be ended by this change. I certainly hope, whatever may be the reference, that we shall have an opportunity to act upon it, and that speedily. I shall not myself press any further the motion that the measure go to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. POMEROY. I think this is a subject peculiarly appropriate for the Committee on Indian Affairs; but I prepared a bill at the last session, embodying somewhat similar provisions to those contained in this bill, and sent it to that committee, or rather the Senate voted that it should be referred to that committee, and that bill has been in the hands of the Committee on Indian Affairs ever since. If there was any reasonable assurance that this bill would ever be reported I would vote to send it there; but I do not think there is.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I feel perplexed to know how to vote upon this motion. I agree with the honorable Senator from Illinois that this is not a proper time to state convictions of the merits of this measure. I think, however, it is the proper time for the Senate to remember that this subject is important, that it is urgent, and that something ought to be done, and that quickly, touching Indian affairs. I know, as the Senator from Illinois has suggested, that in a formal sense, the Committee on Indian Affairs is the appropriate committee to which this bill should go, because it relates to Indian affairs, but we cannot shut our eyes to some facts which stand in opposition to that proposition. The purpose of the bill is to remove a large subject from the jurisdiction of the Committee on Indian Affairs; and it is only saying of that committee what is common to all committees and to all men to affirm that the tribunal itself which it is proposed to oust of a jurisdiction is not ordinarily the best or wisest arbiter of that question.

Neither can we shut our eyes to the fact that the Indian Committee, although just constituted, is the same committee that we have had heretofore, and that, for some reason, this subject has not commanded so much of the attention of that committee as to bring itself at all to the knowledge, or be brought to the knowledge, of the honorable Senator from Maine, one of the leading members of the committee. Thus the subject is ushered in with a very unpromising prospect if it goes to the Committee on Indian Affairs; and it is, I believe, one of the quaint old maxims of the parliamentary law that a child is not to be put to nurse with an unfriendly mother. Now, this nursing mother has certainly not paid very great attention to this particular offspring; and I insist, Mr. President, if it is to be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, that it should go there in the light of the assurance which we have received from the honorable Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THAYER] and the honorable Senator from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] that it will receive attention, and that it will be brought forward, so that Senators may vote upon it and express their convictions in regard to it. If I doubted that, I should insist by my vote that it should go to the Committee on Military Affairs; but trusting to this understanding, that despite the discouragement of the past we shall have an early report, I am willing to vote that the bill shall go to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CONNESS. If Senators will consent, I think I can suggest a means by which we can get out of this difficulty, and which will eventually save, perhaps, some hours of discussion in the Senate. I will move that the two committees—the Committee on Indian Affairs and the Committee on Military Affairs—be constituted a special committee to which this bill shall be referred. I hope gentlemen on both sides will accept this suggestion, because there they can have a full investigation. The Military Committee will not be able to complain that they cannot have a report, because it will have prompt action, and they can fully discuss there a great many parts of the subject that need not be introduced to the Senate when it shall come up for consideration. I make that motion, and hope that gentlemen will accept it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I desire to say one word in reply to the question raised by the Senator from New York as to the disqualification of the Committee on Indian Affairs impartially to consider this question, resting on the supposed interest that they may have by reason of their jurisdiction over the subject which this measure proposes to take away. I ask the honorable Senator if there is any force in that logic; if the fact that the Indian Committee is about to part with its jurisdiction over this subject is to be in the estimation of the Senate a disqualifying fact, to tell the Senate, if he will, what effect it will have upon that committee, which is supposed to extend its jurisdiction by the reception of this authority; whether the Military Committee, who are desirous of thus augmenting their jurisdiction, are not equally disqualified with the Committee on Indian Affairs according to that logic? But I regard that argument of my learned friend rather as suggestive than otherwise.

Mr. CONKLING. I hope the Senator will allow me a moment. I did not remark that either committee had a disposition to magnify its jurisdiction. I simply remarked that the statement made by the Senator from Illinois, that the Indian Committee was the appropriate committee, was to be taken with the qualification that, as a general rule, the tribunal which it was proposed to oust of jurisdiction was not the best tribunal in the world to determine that question. I agree that that applies to the Military Committee as it does to the Indian Committee, and I do not consider it a disqualifying fact as to either; but I do consider it a point in the case going to show that if some better arrangement—and I think the Senator from California has suggested one—could be made it would be just as well not to have this measure go exclusively to either committee.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I am not very serious in urging this point. I merely made the suggestion that there did not seem to be great force in the argument of the Senator that it was a disqualifying fact. I think it might be found to be impracticable to put these two committees together. How are they to act? As independent committees, or as one joint select committee?

Mr. CONNESS. As one joint select committee—a special committee. They will organize whenever they meet without difficulty, I apprehend.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If the Senate think that is the proper way to dispose of the subject I shall not interpose any objection; but still I think the subject had better go, simple and distinct, to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CORBETT. I desire to state, as my friend from Maine has already stated, that this subject of transferring the control of Indian affairs to the War Department was somewhat discussed in the Committee on Indian Affairs at the last session; but I do not remember that the chairman brought that bill to our notice for discussion. Perhaps some reason may be found why he did not do so in his peculiar situation last year; but if the bill had been brought before the committee I have no doubt it would have received a fair examination and a fair report; and if such a bill is referred to the committee now I believe it will receive due consideration, and a report will be presented to the Senate.

The Senator from Massachusetts says that there is a great amount of stealing in the Indian department. I do not know how far that may be the case; but so far as my observation has gone I do not see that there is any more stealing in that department than perhaps in some others that I could point out. I notice by the reports laid before us that it costs between three and four million dollars to support three hundred thousand Indians; and I believe that in that section of the country where there has been the least military force the expense has been far less than in that portion of the country where the military have been stationed in force. In that portion of the country in which I reside, in Oregon, where the military were stationed adjacent to the Indian agencies, there were constant troubles between the soldiers and the Indians, arising from the association of the soldiers with the Indians, and the Government was compelled to remove those troops from the neighborhood of the Indians. A post was established near the Siletz reservation, but subsequently that post was broken up. It cost the Government perhaps one hundred thousand dollars a year. The Indians are now being supported there, and during the past year you have only appropriated for those Indians some ten thousand dollars. I notice that the expense of keeping up the Army, according to the report of the department, is $2,500 to each man, while the cost of supporting the Indians is some ten dollars a head.

It seems to me, when you consider the immense expense of the Army, that you are not going to materially lessen the expenses of the Government by transferring the Indian Bureau to the War Department. In my opinion, the three or four millions which are now expended to support the Indians will be swelled into ten millions by such a transfer. If you detail Army officers to take charge of Indian reservations you will be obliged to increase the Army. Then they must have a police force; they must have a company established at each reservation; and there will be constant trouble between the Indians settled on those reservations, where they are now being placed, and the soldiers. They will become demoralized by association with the soldiers. Such will be the effect of this transfer. I think it very important in this matter that we should have one Department to watch the other; and if the civil department needs the military to keep the Indians in subjection it will be time enough then for them to call for them. But, sir, as it has been suggested that perhaps this is not the proper time to express views on this subject, I desire only to say that if this bill shall be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs it will receive proper consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the unfinished business of yesterday is before the Senate, being the reading of the President's message.

Mr. CONNESS. Let this question of reference be first disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the question will be put on this motion.

Mr. DAVIS. I voted on the standing vote in favor of referring this subject to the Committee on Indian Affairs; but I feel constrained, from the facts stated by the Senator from Ohio, to change my position. It seems that this bill has gone for two successive sessions to that committee, and that there has been no report from that committee upon it. I think that is a neglect of an important subject that ought to be sufficient reason for the reference of the bill now to the Committee on Military Affairs, or some other committee that will consider the subject and will report upon it to the Senate. I have been all along in favor of the management of Indian affairs being retained by the Interior Department, but I have begun so seriously to doubt the expediency and propriety of such a continuance that I am strongly inclined now to vote to transfer the whole subject to the War Department. I merely want it under the supervision of the Department where it ought to be, and which will best attend to the interests of the Indians and of the country. For the present I think the reference should be made, not to the Committee on Indian Affairs, who have twice failed to report on the subject, but to the Committee on Military Affairs, or some other committee.

Mr. THAYER. I rise to say that I have asked for the reference of this bill to the Committee on Indian Affairs because I am unwilling that any reflections shall be cast upon that committee in this way. If there is this complaint against that committee it lies against almost every standing committee of this body. I can say to my friend from Kansas, the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, that I had a bill referred to his committee a year ago, and I have never heard from it since.

Now, Mr. President, if any Senator felt a special interest in having the bill which has been referred to reported back; if he deemed that the Indian Committee did not do its duty, it was proper for him to call the attention of the Senate to it, to offer a resolution instructing or requesting that committee to report. I say for one, and I say to my friend from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] that I do not propose to give any promise, so far as I am concerned, that our action shall be prompt. I do not propose that the committee shall be put upon its good behavior; but I say, as I before said, I have no disposition to kill the bill by keeping it back, by smothering it in committee; and I have none. I am ready for action in this body upon it; and I have no doubt the committee will act on it with that promptness which should be observed in all cases. But I do not propose, as far as I am concerned, to give a pledge as an inducement to the Senate to refer it to that committee. I ask that the same course be observed toward that committee as toward other committees.

Now, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the Senate has had a vote on a bill of this character, proposing to transfer the Indian Bureau to the War Department, and it has been voted down. Therefore the Indian Committee are not to be charged with having neglected their duty, because the Senate have had the question in all its bearings before them, and have voted on it, and voted adversely.

Mr. STEWART. I desire to move an instruction, in order to get the sense of the Senate on the question of the proposed transfer. It has been discussed often in the Senate. I have discussed it myself so frequently that I am almost ashamed to refer to it again. It must be manifest to every one that two Departments, hostile to each other, cannot operate in the Indian country without detriment to the service. That I have seen for the last fifteen or twenty years. There has been a constant strife, and it has been transferred to the Senate. It is quite important to get one or the other Department out of that country, so that we can have unity of action, so that something may be done with the Indians and somebody be responsible. All over that country there is a jealousy between the two Departments operating in the same country, each laying all the blame on the other, and it is difficult to investigate and ascertain where it really is. It seems to me that we had better take the sense of the Senate at once on the subject. I therefore move that the bill be referred, with instructions to the committee to report in favor of the transfer of the Indian Bureau to the War Department.

Mr. ANTHONY. If this vote can be taken without any further debate, I have no objection; but otherwise, if this debate is going on by general consent, I call for the order of the day.

Several SENATORS. Let us have a vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. First, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THAYER] moves to refer this bill to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and on that question the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Senator from California [Mr. CONNESS] moves that that motion be amended so as to refer the bill to the Committee on Indian Affairs and the Committee on Military Affairs jointly, as a special committee.

Mr. CONNESS. With a view of getting a direct vote without any further debate, I withdraw my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion being withdrawn, the question recurs upon referring the bill to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. STEWART. I desire my motion to be put, that the committee be instructed to report in favor of the transfer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on that amendment.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask if the motion of the Senator from Nevada can be separated from the proposition to refer?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Of course it can be divided.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then I ask that it be done. I suppose the first vote will be on the reference, and then the question will be on the instructions. I desire, while I am up, to say that I shall vote to refer this bill to the appropriate committee. There is no question that the Indian Committee is the appropriate committee for the consideration of this bill. I have no doubt it will receive the attention at an early day of that committee. We have the assurances of enough of the honorable Senators who compose that committee to satisfy any gentleman that it will receive that consideration.

I do not intend to discuss the merits of the bill at this time; but in reply to the Senator from Massachusetts, who is chairman of the Military Committee, I will say that his reason for the reference to his committee is not in favor of that reference but in favor of the other. We have had the benefit of the investigation of that committee, and, knowing that he is at the head of it, that investigation has been exhausted, and the Senate can get no more information from that committee. It is better to have a report from the other committee now, and compare the two.

Mr. President, I do not concur in the proposition that this is a transfer of the Indian service to a more economical or a more honest department of the Government than the civil department. I do not think that it is sustained upon any reason nor upon experience. I think that the Senator from Massachusetts cannot say that the record of the quartermaster's department is superior to and freer from question and blemish than the record of the Indian office and the Indian service generally. My opinion is, that the military service of the United States is the most expensive Government service in the world, and that instead of this being a proposition in favor of economy, if the Indian service is to participate in the character of the military service, it is a proposition for extravagance and increase of expenditure. It is known to us all who have examined the records that it has cost this Government much more to fight the Indians than to feed them—very much more; and I think this is a question whether they shall be fed or shall be shot—fed or fought. I am in favor of that policy which I think is consistent with the sentiments of humanity and the high obligations of the American people toward the Indians.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope that the proposition made by way of amendment by the honorable Senator from Nevada will not prevail. My impressions for a long time have been rather in favor of transferring the Indians from the Department of the Interior to the War Department. Still, I am not prepared at the present time to vote so, because I want information on the subject.

Mr. STEWART. If the Senator will allow me, if that is the disposition of those in favor of the proposed change I will not press the motion, but will allow the bill to be referred without instructions.

Mr. FESSENDEN. My honorable friend may withdraw his motion as soon as I get through.

It is manifest to me, Mr. President, as it is to all gentlemen—it does not seem to be disputed—that in the ordinary course of business in the Senate the Indian Committee is the appropriate committee to which this bill should be referred; and that if it is taken out of the hands of that committee it is rather a reflection upon the committee itself, an intimation that they cannot, or will not, arrive at a correct conclusion on the subject. Whatever may be their impressions, it is perfectly obvious that as that committee, and as all committees of the Senate are made up, after the discussion which has been had here, it will be the duty, and unquestionably the pleasure, of that committee at once to take this subject under consideration and report upon it at an early day. It is quite obvious, too, that for their own credit's sake, when they make that report, the report will be accompanied with an argument and with the reasons upon the subject showing the grounds of their opinion. Such would be the case unquestionably if it went to the Committee on Military Affairs; and as has been well remarked by gentlemen, there is the same objection, prima facie, to the Committee on Military Affairs that there is to the Committee on Indian Affairs; and the Committee on Military Affairs has not, by usage, the control of the subject.

Now, sir, I am not afraid to trust this matter to the Committee on Indian Affairs, especially after what has been said here; and I believe that in due time, as soon as they can give the subject the consideration which it deserves, we shall have a full and lucid report from that committee. If it does not meet the approbation of the Senate, it will be time enough then to overrule them and transfer the jurisdiction of these Indians to the military arm of the Government, if that is thought advisable by Senators. Still, before acting upon it, I wish to have the matter thoroughly discussed; I wish to have the correctness of my own impressions tested; and if the Committee on Indian Affairs shall satisfy me, either by a report or by a subsequent debate, that I am wrong in my impressions, it will give me great pleasure at once to change them, and to vote to retain the subject-matter where it is. But, sir, until that is done I do not wish to be called upon to act on the subject, and I am glad to hear that my friend from Nevada is ready to withdraw his motion. I think it will be better to keep up the usage of the Senate, to cast no reflection upon any committee—we can at any time control the matter—and let the measure go where it properly and appropriately belongs.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I think I may call to the attention of the Senate some facts which, perhaps, have escaped recollection at the present moment. On one occasion, some years ago, there was a joint committee appointed by the two Houses having charge of this whole question, and on a full examination and taking of testimony of the treatment of the Indians, both by the Army officers and by the civilians, the joint committee of the two Houses unanimously reported against this very proposition to transfer the Bureau of Indian Affairs to the War Department. It is true that on several occasions the Military Committee of this body have recommended that transfer. It is true, also, that on several occasions in the Senate within the last few years the question has been pressed upon the Senate and discussed in open Senate, and discussed at length, and the Senate, by a large majority, have voted down the proposition to transfer the Bureau of Indian Affairs to the War Department. If this bill was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs at the last session I must say that it escaped my recollection. I was not aware that there was such a bill referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs at the last session; but at the session before I think there was, and the proposition came before the Senate a year ago this last winter, and on full discussion the sense of the Senate was taken. Under all these circumstances, therefore, it seems to me that there is no reason for supposing that the Committee on Indian Affairs have, in any respect, desired to avoid any responsibility about reporting on this question the one way or the other. That Committee will act upon the question just as much as any other committee of the body.

The fact that a special committee was once appointed having this subject in charge, who reported upon it, and the sense of the Senate taken on two or three different occasions, I think, ought to be considered before any gentleman should indulge for a moment any idea that the Indian Committee are not willing to take the responsibility of acting on this question. I believe they will take that responsibility, and will act.

For myself, having examined the question, as I did, both as a member of that joint committee and as a member of the Indian Committee on former occasions, I have not yet seen anything to change my opinion, an opinion which I then formed, and which I expressed here freely; but still I am, for one, perfectly willing to go into an investigation of the facts. If any new facts, or anything new in the condition of our Indian affairs has arisen, certainly I am willing, for one, to examine those facts and give to their consideration my best attention.

This is a very important question; Mr. President. I know that so long as Indian affairs are under the control of the civil department there must be estimates made for every particular item of expenditure for every Indian tribe, for every agency, for every Territory. They must be in items, reported to Congress, and Congress can open its eyes and look on those estimates and discuss them. Put the Indian Bureau under the War Department, and the estimates will come in, for subsistence of the Army so many millions, for transportation for the Army so many more millions; and you can easily put through a bill here for forty or fifty millions, or a deficiency bill of ten, fifteen, or twenty millions, and nobody questions it at all. It is a very easy way to get your legislation on the subject of Indian affairs; certainly to get the money. I do not deny that there are abuses in the Indian department. Abuses will grow up in every department of the Government where money is expended. But the committee to which I have referred, you will remember, Mr. President, proposed to the Senate at that time a plan for the better administration of Indian affairs—a bill which passed the Senate, but failed in the House of Representatives.

This is an important subject, and it ought to have a careful consideration. Whichever committee it goes to, as far as I am concerned personally, it makes no difference, for I happen to be placed both on the Indian Committee and the Military Committee; but still it is a question which properly belongs to the Committee on Indian Affairs, as I think.

Mr. STEWART. I did not desire in making this motion to reflect upon the Committee on Indian Affairs, or express any want of confidence in them. My want of confidence is in our Indian system. I have seen it work, and my mind is fully made up that it will never be a success. The system of having two Departments of the Government working at cross-purposes in the Indian territory has been a failure. Whether one of them can succeed or not it is well enough to try. We certainly cannot do this business any worse than it is being done now. It is a disgrace to our country that we cannot manage our Indian affairs without so much corruption, and without so much barbarity. Other countries do it. Right on our border Great Britain is successful, and she operates through her military principally. She is successful, and it is not an expensive service there, where they have more wild Indians than we have. But we are unsuccessful, operating through two Departments. Now let us try one. The very nature of the service requires unity of action. The Indian must know that somebody is responsible. He must not be told one thing by one man and another thing by another man, because he will not believe either. Our system is a system that leads the Indians to have no confidence in us. There can be no unity of purpose when there are two Departments both operating in the same country. I want to see the system organized so there shall be a head. I do not wish to reflect on the War Department or the Interior Department, but I say it should be left to one Department or the other to manage the Indians, so that the Indians shall know who is boss, who is chief, who is big chief, and who are responsible to see that contracts are carried out. Under our present system there is constant abuse. However, I will withdraw the motion I made and let the bill go to the Indian Committee.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. My honorable friend from Nevada, it seems to me, is very unfortunate in his allusion to the administration of Indian affairs in the neighboring Dominion under the Government of Great Britain. He says they deal with them through the army. Not at all, sir. This body once appointed a special committee to examine into the Indian affairs of the neighboring province, and they made their report of the facts to this body. If my honorable friend had given his attention to the report on that subject he could not have fallen into such an error. They do not deal with them through the army at all. They deal with them by civilians and civil agents and the missionaries, whom they encourage among them, altogether. That is the reason why they have peace all over the Dominion of Canada and not war, or one of the reasons. I will not say it is the whole reason, because, with them it is different from what it is with us. The amount of emigration on our part is pushing every where into the Indian territory and not into the Dominion.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to inquire of the Senator, in that connection, whether he pretends to say that they have two departments operating at the same time to perform this service? Does not one department direct the whole service?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have stated the fact that they do not deal with the Indians in the Dominion by the army at all. They deal with them through civil officers and the schools and the missionaries which they establish among them. Their system of civil administration, perhaps, in the appointment of persons connected with Indian affairs, is better than ours, growing out of the fact that if they are not appointed practically for life they are kept in almost for life. I did not intend to go into the argument of the merits of the question any further than to reply to the statement made by the honorable Senator. In my judgment, he made a mistake in alluding to the administration of Indian affairs in Canada as a reason why we should administer our own Indian affairs through the Army and the War Department. I do not intend to continue the discussion, as I suppose the Senate is anxious to come to a vote.

Mr. STEWART. I certainly am very greatly misinformed if the persons in the Indian country there have not complete control of civil and military affairs. There is only one head there, only one department to control Indian affairs, which controls both the civil and military relations and preserves unity of purpose. I know I have met a great many persons who were up in the Frazer river country, where there was a heavy emigration, where the emigration came in immediate contact with a great number of Indians, and they said they had no difficulty. Peace was preserved. There was unity of purpose there. There are no two departments operating in that country. I am quite certain of that. If there was, they would have the same confusion that you have here.

Mr. WARNER. I hope the original motion to refer this bill to the appropriate committee will prevail. This is not the time, I am aware, to discuss the merits of the bill. There is high authority for and against it. But I think the action of the Senate in refusing to refer this bill to the appropriate committee would be regarded by the world as conclusive of the sense of this body that the bill is to pass without that thorough examination and consideration by the appropriate committee of this body, who have in charge Indian affairs, and who are supposed best to understand and best to represent the interests of the Indians, which it should receive. There will be a wide difference of opinion in regard to this bill. There is a wide-spread conviction in the country that our treatment of the Indians amounts to a national disgrace and a national crime second only to that of our treatment of the colored race, and that we are suffering, and will suffer, the like penalty which we suffered in that case if we do not deal with them upon principles of humanity. I only say this to ask that this bill may have its proper reference, and have an examination by its appropriate committee.

I think I know what the conclusion of the Military Committee will be. They will represent the will and wishes of the Army. The Army think and feel that if they have to do the fighting they ought to have the control of the Indians. There is a pretty general feeling among the friends of the Indians that if we had less fighting and more justice in our treatment of the Indians it would be better. Already the rumor is in the papers that the recent battle was but a massacre of friendly Indians upon a Government reservation. I have the authority of an Army officer, just from the plains, who says that Black Kettle, reported as killed, was a friendly Indian, and carried his warriors away last summer to New Mexico to keep them out of the fight. I think this subject of sufficient importance to give it a reference to its appropriate committee that it may have a thorough examination, and then, if necessary, it may be referred to the Military Committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the reference of the bill to the Committee on Indian Affairs, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. WILSON. I suggest that the call for the yeas and nays be withdrawn.

Mr. THAYER. I withdraw the call.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be withdrawn if there be no objection. The question is on referring the bill to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, transmitting a tabular statement in duplicate, showing, as far as the accounts of Indian superintendents and agents have been received up to June 30, 1868, the disbursements of funds appropriated for incidental, contingent, and miscellaneous purposes of Indian intercourse for the year ending June 30, 1868; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 1484) to relieve from disabilities Franklin J. Moses, of South Carolina; A bill (H. R. No. 1485) providing for an election in Virginia; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 372) directing the sale of the steamer Atlantic.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 658) to relieve from disabilities Franklin J. Moses, a citizen of South Carolina.

SENATOR FROM GEORGIA.

Mr. SHERMAN. For the purpose of referring the credentials of Mr. Hill, of Georgia, I move that they be taken up for consideration. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. At the request of the Senator-elect I move to refer his credentials to the Committee on the Judiciary, as the desire has been expressed by several Senators to have the opinion of that committee, although he wishes prompt action.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that with the credentials the memorials and other papers relating to that question be referred also.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well; let all the papers be referred, the communication of Governor Bullock and also the other communication.

Mr. SUMNER. The memorial presented by my colleague.

Mr. SHERMAN. All those papers should be referred at the same time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion embraces all the papers relating to the subject. The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. FERRY presented the petition of the New Haven, Middletown, and Willimantic Railroad Company, praying that the bridge across the Connecticut river, to be constructed by that company, may be declared a lawful structure and a post road for the passage of the mail of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented the petition of the Shore Line railway, praying for the passage of an act authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Connecticut river by that railway; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. WILLEY presented papers in relation to the claim of R. W. Dawson; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. VICKERS presented the memorial of William Cornell Jewett, in relation to the proposed vote of censure against Hon. Reverdy Johnson, minister to England; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I present a petition signed by several ladies, approved by General Howard, and certified by the mayors of Washington and Georgetown, in which they pray that aid may be granted for the relief of the destitute people in this District. I present it at this time in the hope that the honorable chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia will see that immediate action is taken upon it, as from the statements of the petition, which are well attested, and other information that I have, I am satisfied that it is a matter upon which immediate action is demanded, if any action is to be taken at all. In accordance with our previous legislation upon the subject there seems to me to be no objection to granting the aid desired, and I have no doubt that the reasons are strong enough to satisfy the committee that they ought to take some action on the subject at once, and I hope it will be done. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. RAMSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 683) granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad from St. Paul, Minnesota, to the Missouri river; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 186) declaratory and amendatory of the act entitled "An Act to provide for an American line of mail and emigrant passenger steamships between New York and one or more European ports," passed July 27, 1868; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. COLE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 664) to provide for the paving of Pennsylvania avenue; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 665) to repeal section six of the act entitled "An Act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1868," approved March 2, 1867; which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CONNESS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 666) fixing the compensation for labor performed for the Government of the United States; which was read twice by its title, laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CHANDLER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 186) providing for the sale of the lands, tenements, and water privileges belonging to the United States at and near Harper's Ferry, in the county of Jefferson, West Virginia.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. No. 658) to relieve from disabilities Franklin J. Moses, a citizen of South Carolina; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 1485) providing for an election in Virginia was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; and the joint resolution (H. R. No. 372) directing the sale of the steamer Atlantic was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The bill (H. R. No. 1484) to relieve from disabilities Franklin J. Moses, of South Carolina, was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill has been superseded by a bill just passed exactly like it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that it be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

SELECTION OF JURORS IN UTAH.

Mr. CRAGIN. I desire to move that Senate bill No. 24, reported from the Committee on Territories, be recommitted. In order to make that motion I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 24) to regulate the selection of grand and petit jurors in the Territory of Utah, and for other purposes.

Mr. CRAGIN. I now move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Territories. The motion was agreed to.

ELECTIVE FRANCHISE.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up Senate bill No. 111 to regulate the elective franchise in the United States, with a view of moving its reference.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I now move that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up the joint resolution (S. R. No. 59) submitting to the Legislatures of the several States a proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States, with a view to its reference.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution was read the second time by its title.

Mr. WILSON. I move the reference of the joint resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

ARMS TO THE SOUTHERN STATES.

Mr. RICE. I move that the Senate take up the bill (S. No. 652) to provide for the issue of arms for the use of the militia in certain States lately in rebellion, with a view of putting it upon its passage.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear it read for information before we act upon it.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to deliver to the Governor of each of the following-named States: North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Louisiana, and Arkansas, at the seat of government of each of said States, for the use of the militia thereof, as many serviceable Springfield rifled muskets of caliber fifty-eight, with accoutrements and equipments complete, and serviceable field-pieces, with carriages, caissons, equipments, and implements as the Governors of such States respectively shall require for the use of the militia thereof, not exceeding two thousand rifled muskets, with accoutrements and implements, and two field-pieces, with carriages, caissons, and implements, for each congressional district in said States; and the same shall be delivered only upon the certificate of the Governor of the State showing to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War that the regiments and companies for which the same are required are organized of loyal citizens of such States under the laws thereof; and said muskets, field-pieces, and accoutrements shall remain the property of the United States, subject to the control of Congress.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That so much of section six of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes," as applies to the States above named, together with all other acts inconsistent herewith, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on taking up the bill for consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I think it will be more satisfactory to have that bill referred, and I move its reference to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. RICE. The only objection I have to its reference is, that in the State which I in part represent the militia is being organized, and there is great need of arms. It is impossible to perfect the organization without them. The Legislature is now in session, and it will greatly facilitate matters if there is an early passage of this bill. The bill, in substance, was before Congress at its last session, and the Senate passed it with only five nays, I believe, at that time. It was before the Military Committee, and they reported it unanimously. There is very little difference between that bill and this—no difference except in the quantity of arms that are to be distributed, so far as the southern States are concerned. I could not see any necessity for its reference to the Military Committee, or I should have so moved. I hope it will be put on its passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. GRIMES, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

REFERENCE OF PETITIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that many petitions have been presented during the session which are now lying on the table, and if there be no objection those petitions will be referred by the Clerk to the appropriate committees without taking them up specially. Is there any objection to that course? None being made, that will be done by the Clerk.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. I desire to have the memorial presented by myself a few days ago on the subject of the navigation of the Tennessee river referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so referred.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I was about to call attention to the Calendar, with a view of removing from it the business which will no longer require attention; but I shall not do it at present if other Senators have other matters to attend to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I call for the unfinished business. I moved yesterday that the Senate adjourn while the President's message was being read. Some of my friends who desired to have it read seem to have supposed that it was intended to prevent its reading; and some gentlemen who are not my friends, as I understand by the public prints, are of the same opinion. On the contrary, I am in favor of having it read for the benefit of the party to which I belong and for the benefit of the country, that they may see what sort of an official they have at the head of the Government. I therefore call for the unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It does not need any motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. We have passed it over by common consent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Well, now I call it up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It takes a motion to call it up. The question is on that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON,] to suspend the further reading of the message.

Mr. POMEROY. I understood the motion to be that the message lie on the table and be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No; a motion was made by the Senator from California [Mr. CONNESS] to suspend the further reading, which he withdrew; but the motion was renewed by the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON,] and that motion is now pending.

Mr. CAMERON. At the suggestion of Senators around me I withdraw my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is withdrawn, and the Secretary will resume the reading of the message.

GEORGE C. GORHAM, esq., Secretary of the Senate, thereupon resumed the reading of the President's annual message at the point at which he was interrupted yesterday.

The message having been read,

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the message be laid on the table and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, in view of the extraordinary propositions that the message of his Excellency, the President of the United States, has developed on the subject of the national debt, I wish to give notice that on Tuesday next, unless in the mean time the Committee on Finance shall have reported, as I have no doubt they will, a resolution upon that subject which I had the honor to offer on the 21st of November, 1867, I shall move that the Committee on Finance be discharged from the consideration of that joint resolution, and shall ask the Senate to consider and pass it. Lest the substance of it may have been forgotten I wish to call attention to it now. It provides as follows:

Whereas the public debt of the United States was (except where specially otherwise provided) contracted and incurred upon the faith and credit of the United States that the same would be paid or redeemed in coin or its equivalent; and whereas doubts have been raised as to the duty and propriety of discharging such debt in coin or its equivalent:

Resolved, &c., That the public debt of the United States (except in the cases where in the law authorizing the same other provision was expressly made) is owing in coin or its equivalent, and the faith of the United States is hereby solemnly pledged to its payment accordingly.

That is the issue which I propose for one to make with the most extraordinary doctrine which is advanced in this message, that we are to flatly repudiate this debt by providing that the interest upon it shall be taken as a payment of the principal, and thus dishonor ourselves forever in the eyes of all honest men.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I do not think it proper that this message should pass without having a word said in reference to it; and I shall occupy the attention of the Senate very briefly.

I am glad the message has been read. That much was due to our respect for the highest official position of the nation, perhaps the highest position in the world. As to the reflections contained in it upon Congress, let me say that a legislative department which, in harmony and cooperation with the patriotism of the people, with the exertions of our lamented President, with the heroism of our ever-triumphant General, has succeeded in rescuing the nation, and which for four years has carried on a contest with obstruction and obstructionists, and has just received the cordial and jubilant indorsement of a great, free people, cannot be disparaged by the petulant denunciations of the vanquished.

I am glad that the message has been read, for it is important that the world should know, and those who have given us credit abroad should be advised, that our attention has been called to the fact—a fact that were we not wonted and accustomed to wonders would astound us all—to wit, that the chief Executive of the nation puts forth the unvarnished proposition that we shall pay the interest on our national debt for sixteen or seventeen years, and then that the debt itself shall be repudiated; and thus this young Christian Republic be made a hissing by-word among the nations of the earth, and a credit, which is worth more to this young nation just entering on its grand career than the amount of the debt multiplied a hundred fold, shall be shipwrecked forever.

I am glad the message has been read, in order that we, the accredited representatives of this Government, may declare to the nations of the earth that we repudiate and reject the repudiating doctrine of the message, and that we may tell them that the plain people of the land, who had the heroism to preserve the liberties of this country, however the Executive may underrate them, are possessed of the integrity, the will, and the ability to preserve their country's honor. In our illimitable domain, in our waving fields, in our exhaustless mines, in our industrial enterprise—yes, and if it need be, in the tension and toil of every muscle, and in the sweat-drops from every brow—the world has the pledge that the honor and the faith of America shall be inviolate.

I am glad, too, that we have the opportunity of calling the attention of the public to the fact that if we proceed to pay the principal of our debt at the same rate that we have been paying it for the last five years, at the end of twenty years there will be no debt to tempt us to self-dishonor or self-destruction. Nay, sir, civil liberty and equality will not die to the world by the stab that repudiation would inflict, while the people through their lawfully elected representatives rule the nation. It is only a little longer, sir, but a little longer. Let us be patient.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HARPER'S FERRY, WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. GARFIELD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, Senate bill No. 186, providing for the sale of the lands, tenements, and water privileges belonging to the United States at and near Harper's Ferry, in the county of Jefferson, West Virginia.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read at length. The first section directs the Secretary of War to make sale at public auction of the lands, tenements, and water privileges belonging to the United States at and near Harper's Ferry, in the county of Jefferson, West Virginia, except as hereinafter provided, in such parcels as shall, in his opinion, be best adapted to secure the greatest amount of money therefor on a credit of one and two years, taking bond and security from the purchaser or purchasers for the payment of the purchase money; and provides that the proceeds of such sale shall be applied by him as follows; provided, that no such sale shall be made until the time, terms, and place thereof shall have been published in one of the principal newspapers in each of the cities of Washington, New York, and Cincinnati for sixty days prior to the day of sale: first, in defraying the expenses of making said sale; second, in refunding to the United States the principal sum of purchase money paid for said lands, tenements, and water privileges by the United States, and for the erection of buildings thereon; and third, if any surplus remain, he shall deliver the same to such agent as the Legislature of the State of West Virginia shall appoint to receive the same; but upon condition that such surplus shall be received by the State of West Virginia to be set apart, held, invested, used, and applied as a part of the school fund of that State, under and by virtue of, and in manner and form as provided in section first of the tenth article of the constitution of West Virginia, and for no other purpose. And on making such sale of the said lands, tenements, and water privileges, or any part thereof, the said Secretary of War is hereby empowered and required, on receiving the purchase money in full, to execute all necessary deeds therefor to the purchaser or purchasers thereof, on behalf of the United States.

The second section directs the Secretary of War to convey by deed to Storer College, an institution of learning chartered by the State of West Virginia, all those certain portions of the aforesaid property, namely: the buildings, with the lots on which they stand, numbered thirty, thirty-one, and thirty-two, and also building numbered twenty-five, with enough of the lot on which it stands to give a breadth of ten rods on High street, otherwise known as Washington street, all of said buildings and lots being situated at Harper's Ferry aforesaid, being the same which have heretofore been assigned by the War Department to the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands for educational purposes; and also to convey by deed to the proper persons all such other lands and buildings, portions of the aforesaid property, as have heretofore been set apart by the proper authority for religious, charitable, and town purposes.

The bill was then read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BERGEN HEIGHTS ARSENAL.

Mr. GARFIELD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a joint resolution (H. R. No. 373) directing the Secretary of War to sell Bergen Heights arsenal; which was read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed and read a third time.

The joint resolution, which was read, directs the Secretary of War to sell at public auction, to the highest bidder, the land and tenements belonging to the United States situate in the county of Hudson, State of New Jersey, and known as the Bergen Heights arsenal; the sale to be made on the ground, after thirty days' notice, in the Newark Daily Advertiser and Newark Evening Courier, and in the Daily Times and Evening Journal of Jersey City; the proceeds arising from said sale to be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

The question was on ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. GARFIELD. This joint resolution is in accordance with the recommendation of the War Department; and in explanation of it I submit the following letter from the Governor of West Virginia:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 23, 1868.

SIR: I regret to learn that that portion of the Senate bill directing a sale of what remains of the armory property at Harper's Ferry, West Virginia, which provides that after reimbursing the United States for buildings erected, &c., the surplus shall go to the free-school fund of West Virginia, has met with opposition in your committee.

The State of Virginia—the mother State—had no free-school system, nor had she any school fund, except a very small one, for the education of the indigent—indeed, I may say, pauper children; and it was wholly insufficient for this purpose, as is evidenced by the census of 1860, where we find that more than eighty thousand of her free citizens over twenty-one years of age could not read and write; and, of course, West Virginia has received nothing, nor can she expect anything, for educational purposes from the old State. The truth is, that while Virginia fostered the University, could build asylums for the insane, and the deaf, dumb, and the blind, and spend millions for railroads in the eastern portion of the State, the west was wholly disregarded and neglected in all these particulars, so that when West Virginia was established, in 1863, she had no schools, no State public buildings of any kind, and no railroads or other improvements that had been built by Virginia, notwithstanding the people had paid large sums into the treasury as taxes on their property from year to year as they were demanded. She had no public lands within her borders, as the States of the Northwest had, out of which a portion might be claimed for school or other purposes; nor had she any other fund whatever to which she could resort for any of those purposes. Moreover, the rebellion was upon the country, and within her borders, actually devastating and laying waste her territory; and, while East Virginia joined all her power and influence with the enemies of the Government, West Virginia was true to her allegiance, and supported the Government with thirty-three thousand of her sons in the Army at a cost of over two million dollars in bounties, besides other liberal expenditures for the same purpose.

Under these circumstances, and at the time mentioned, the people of West Virginia adopted a constitution making it imperative on the Legislature to provide free schools for the children of the State; and the Legislature, at the first session, in 1863, passed a law providing schools for the free education of all the children of the State, both white and colored, between the ages of six and twenty-one years, and this law is still in force, and has been most vigorously and successfully executed.

We have built within the time mentioned about one thousand school-houses—some of them, in the cities and towns, costing from six to ten thousand dollars each, and are supplied with the most modern school furniture. All this, as well as supporting the schools and erecting an asylum for the insane, penitentiary, &c., has been done by direct taxation; which, in view of the facts above referred to, bears heavily upon the people of the State. Notwithstanding these adverse circumstances, however, those who have had control of the affairs of the State, and the constituency by which they have been supported, have determined to enlighten the masses and to press forward with the progress of the time, and not to allow them to remain where they were found when we separated from the old State.

Our State, not having received any aid from Virginia, or from the United States for school purposes, or indeed for any other purpose, it was believed that after reimbursing the General Government for the improvements on the armory property, and thus saving from any loss, Congress would allow the surplus, if any, to go into the school fund of the State, and thus lighten the taxes of our people to that extent. What the amount of the surplus may be cannot now be told; but from information derived from the most intelligent and reliable sources, I am satisfied that the sum will be small—far less than some persons seem to imagine.

May I not ask, therefore, that the committee will take this subject under consideration again, in connection with the statement I have here made? And may I not trust that it will be their pleasure to report the bill as it came from the Senate, and give it their support in the House?

I am, with the highest regard, your obedient servant,

A. I. BOREMAN,
Governor of West Virginia.

Hon. JAMES A. GARFIELD, Chairman of Committee on Military Affairs, House of Representatives.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Does this joint resolution provide for giving a deed for the property?

Mr. GARFIELD. Authority is given to sell, and I presume no further authority is necessary.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The party purchasing does not get a good title till he receives a deed; and in all bills of this kind authority has been given to execute a deed.

Mr. GARFIELD. Authority is given in this bill to sell and transfer. That implies the execution of a deed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I think it would be well to insert after the words "sell and transfer" the words "by good and sufficient conveyance, to be executed by the Secretary of War, transferring all the right, title, and interest of the United States."

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no objection to that amendment.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Illinois will be regarded as adopted.

There was no objection.

The joint resolution, as amended, was passed.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JUDGE ADVOCATES OF THE ARMY.

Mr. GARFIELD also reported, from the Committee on Military Affairs, a bill (H. R. No. 1487) to declare and fix the status of the corps of judge advocates of the Army; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, recites in the preamble that doubts have arisen whether the judge advocates of the Army, though originally commissioned in the regular service, constitute a permanent corps in which vacancies may be filled; that it is expedient the said corps be made permanent and vacancies filled therein. The bill therefore provides that the corps of judge advocates of the Army be fixed at twelve members, including a Judge Advocate General and an Assistant Judge Advocate General; and the President is authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to fill all vacancies which have occurred or may hereafter occur.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHATTANOOGA ROLLING-MILL.

Mr. GARFIELD also, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a joint resolution (H. R. No. 374) authorizing the sale of the Chattanooga rolling-mill property at Chattanooga, Tennessee, to the Southwestern Iron Company; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, recites in the preamble that the United States, on the 5th of October, 1865, in consideration of the sum of $175,000 leased to John A. Spooner, of Plymouth, Massachusetts, his legal representatives and assigns, all the property known as the United States military rolling-mill in Chattanooga, Tennessee, and all the buildings, tools, machinery, fixtures, furniture, equipments, and appurtenances connected therewith, together with the railroad track connecting the mill with the Nashville and Chattanooga railroad, for two years from the date of the lease, with a further agreement contained in the lease that the United States would, upon the request of Spooner, his legal representatives or assigns, sell, transfer, and convey, by good and sufficient deed, the absolute title of the mill, buildings, machinery, and other property to Spooner, his representatives or assigns, to his or their own use. It is further recited that Spooner has assigned his interest in the lease to the Southwestern Iron Company, and the company have requested the United States to convey to them the mill, buildings, machinery, &c.

The joint resolution proposes to authorize the Secretary of War, in consideration of the sum already paid, to make, execute, and deliver all needful instruments conveying and transferring to the Southwestern Iron Company all the right, title, and interest of the United States in and to the Chattanooga rolling-mill, with the buildings, tools, machinery, &c., and the railroad track connecting the mill with the Nashville and Chattanooga railroad.

Mr. MULLINS. I desire to ask what amount is to be paid for this property. I believe it is not mentioned in the bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. As the bill recites, $175,000 have been paid for the lease, which provided that on the request of the lessee or his assigns a deed for the property should be made to him or them by the United States. That request has been made, and this bill provides, strictly in accordance with the terms of the contract, that the absolute title of this property shall be transferred to the Southwestern Iron Company. They have already paid the money, and it is only necessary to complete the terms of a contract already executed. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. PAINE. I wish the chairman of the committee would inform the House whether, in his judgment, the amount which has been paid by this company to the United States is an adequate compensation for this property. It may be very true that officers of the Government have agreed that the deed shall be made transferring this property pursuant to a contract, but that does not bind us at all to ratify it, and I do not want to consent to it unless the chairman will say to the House that he knows or believes, or has reason to believe, that the compensation is adequate.

Mr. GARFIELD. I yield to my colleague on the committee to answer that inquiry.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. In reply to the question of the gentleman from Wisconsin, I will say that this whole subject was investigated by the special Committee on Southern Railroads, of which I am a member, and I am satisfied that the price paid was a fair compensation. There is a doubt as to the title to be conferred by the Government—whether it has any title to the land at all or not—and that doubt makes the value of the property less than it would be otherwise. It was land captured and taken by the rebels, and then recaptured by us.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MONUMENT TO GENERAL KEARNY.

Mr. GARFIELD, from the same committee, reported a joint resolution (H. R. No. 375) donating condemned cannon for the erection of a monument to Major General Kearny; which was read a first and second time.

It authorizes the Secretary of War to furnish such condemned iron cannon as may be required, not exceeding four, for the completion of a monument at Tivoli, New York, over the remains of the late Major General Philip Kearny, and other Union soldiers buried at that place, who lost their lives in the late war.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ASYLUMS FOR DISABLED SOLDIERS.

Mr. GARFIELD, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1488) to consolidate the several asylums for aged and disabled soldiers, created under the laws of the United States; which was read a first and second time.

The bill provides that the military asylums established by the several acts of Congress heretofore passed, with all their rights and privileges, shall be transferred to and made a part of the National Asylum for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

Section two provides that all the duties and powers to be exercised or performed by any person or officer relative to said soldiers shall be vested in and exercised by the board of managers of the said asylum, under such rules and regulations as they may determine, provided nothing in this act shall change in any way the claim of any veteran or disabled soldier to support in said national asylum.

Section three changes the name of the "National Asylum for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers" to "Veteran Soldiers' Home."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SAULT STE. MARIE RESERVATION.

Mr. GARFIELD, from the same committee, reported, in accordance with the recommendation of the Secretary of War, a bill (H. R. No. 1489) granting a portion of the military reservation at Sault Ste. Marie, Michigan, to the American Baptist Home Mission Society; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read. It proposes to authorize the Secretary of War to convey to the American Baptist Home Mission Society, by good and sufficient title, a part of the military reservation at Sault Ste. Marie, in the State of Michigan, not to exceed one acre, now occupied by mission buildings owned by said society.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAY OF MILITARY INSTRUCTORS.

Mr. GARFIELD, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1490) to define the pay of officers of the Army detailed to act as military instructors; which was read a first and second time.

The bill provides that all officers detailed to give military instruction in colleges and universities, under the provisions of the act to increase and fix the military peace establishment of the United States, approved July 28, 1866, shall, while so detailed, be entitled to the full pay of their respective grades the same as if they were on active service.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

W. G. MORSE AND CHARLES S. SHAMBAUGH.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be directed to pay out of the contingent fund the sum of $400 to W. G. Morse, and the sum of $100 to Charles S. Shambaugh, which shall be in full of all claim by them on account of services rendered to the Committee on Military Affairs in collecting, during the recess of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, papers and evidence respecting artificial limbs furnished to soldiers.

I will say that this is an expenditure incurred during the last Congress, and the adjustment of the amount has been fixed in the bill according to the recommendation of my colleague, [Mr. SCHENCK,] the former chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. ROSS. I make the point of order that the resolution contains an appropriation, and must have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order upon the ground that the amount is to be paid out of the contingent fund, which is appropriated in an appropriation bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move the previous question.

Mr. BROOMALL. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. GARFIELD. I will.

Mr. BROOMALL. I am under the impression that the gentleman's resolution will not take money out of the contingent fund for the purposes for which this is intended. I think it requires a joint resolution or bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It has been so decided again and again at the Treasury Department.

Mr. BROOMALL. That is my understanding of the law, and I therefore suggest to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs that he had better make his resolution a joint resolution, unless he is sure that I am mistaken.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will modify the resolution and make it a joint resolution.

I will state that there were some seven thousand circulars from the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs in the last Congress sent out to all the soldiers who had lost limbs, inquiring whether the artificial limbs furnished by the Government answered their necessities, and also for the purpose of completing and perfecting arrangements for furnishing them to those who have not received them.

Mr. MAYNARD. Has the gentleman considered the question whether we can appropriate money out of the contingent fund to pay for a claim that originated in the last Congress?

Mr. GARFIELD. It is now a joint resolution, and its passage is recommended by the former chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 376) was then read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MILITARY INSTRUCTION.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, House bill No. 905, to establish a national system of military education.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill was read at length. The first section authorizes and directs the President of the United States upon the application of that one of the colleges or universities of any State of the Union, and of that one additional college or university for every additional million of inhabitants above one million in any State, which may be designated by the Legislature thereof, to detail from time to time one competent officer of the Army to act as military professor, and one competent lieutenant of the Army, for periods of two years, to act as military assistant in every such college or university, and to prescribe the text-books, the course of military studies and military exercises to be taught by said officers, as the condition which shall entitle said colleges or universities to the privileges hereafter provided, and to establish rules and regulations for the government of the officers so detailed, but without infringement of the rights of self-government of said colleges or universities; provided, that the colleges or universities so designated have a capacity sufficient to educate at one time, in a complete course of liberal studies, not less than one hundred male students each, and grounds suitable for military exercises.

The second section provides that whenever any college or university shall have established a course of military instruction and exercises under the foregoing section of this act, the President shall cause to be issued for the use of such college or university, on the requisition of the military professor, such text-books as may be necessary for the prescribed course of military instruction, whenever Congress shall have appropriated money for that purpose, and such ordnance and ordnance stores and camp and garrison equipage as may be necessary for the prescribed instruction in military exercises; and the President shall direct the detail of one ordnance sergeant, and the enlistment of two competent musicians, to be styled college musicians, who shall have the pay and allowances of principal musicians of regiments, for appropriate duties at every such college or university.

The third section provides that the faculty of every college or university which shall have complied with the provisions of this act shall be authorized to recommend to the President of the United States, on or before the 30th day of June of each year, a list of graduates of such college, of the class of that year, as nearly as practicable in the proportion of one to every ten of such graduates distinguished for general proficiency in the collegiate course, special attainments in military science and skill in military exercises, of good moral character and of sound health; that the names of the distinguished graduates so recommended shall be published in the Army Register of that year, that one from each college of the graduates so recommended shall be commissioned in the Army in the same manner as provided by law for the graduates of the Military Academy at West Point; provided that such appointments shall be made after the assignment of the graduates of said Military Academy of that year, and that, when actual vacancies shall still exist in the Army in the grade of second lieutenant after said assignments and appointments all such vacancies shall be filled, as far as practicable, from the lists of distinguished graduates of colleges recommended as herein provided, regard being had in all such appointments to the order of relative merit of such graduates as fixed by the faculty of each college or university in their official recommendations, and to an equitable distribution of such additional appointments among all said colleges or universities; and provided further, that the rights under existing laws of meritorious non-commissioned officers to recommendation, examination, and promotion in the Army shall in no wise be prejudiced.

The fourth section provides that for the purpose of encouraging continued study and improvement among officers of the Army, and of securing and rewarding the exercise of special talent and zeal in the cause of military education by officers detailed at colleges under the provisions of this act, they shall have, by virtue of such detail and while so employed, rank and the infantry pay and emoluments thereof, as follows, namely, a military professor of more than twenty years' service in the Army, the rank of lieutenant colonel; a military professor of less than twenty years' service in the Army the rank of major, and a military assistant the rank of captain.

The fifth section provides that the President shall detail an officer of the Army to serve as director general of military education, who while serving as such shall have the rank, pay, and emoluments of brigadier general. Said director general shall be stationed at Washington, and shall, as often as necessary, inspect the Military Academy at West Point, and the colleges at which officers may be stationed under this act, to secure uniformity of military instruction and faithful attention to duty on the part of officers; and he shall make to the Secretary of War, for the information of Congress, annual reports of the operations of the Military Academy at West Point, and of the military departments of colleges in which the provisions of this act shall have been complied with; and there shall be detailed from the Army, from time to time, an officer to act under the director general as assistant director of military education, who shall have, by virtue of such detail and while so employed, the rank, pay, and emoluments of colonel; and the director general may employ not more than two clerks, one of the second and one of the third class.

The sixth section provides that there shall be appropriated from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for each college or university which shall have introduced into its plan of instruction a course of military instruction in accordance with the provisions of this act, the sum of $2,000, to be expended by the director general of military education, with the approval of the Secretary of War, in the purchase of the necessary books of reference, maps, models, and text-books for issue to students for the prescribed course of military education.

Mr. GARFIELD. I see by the manifestations around me that the members of the House have not generally read this bill, and I will not, therefore, ask for final action upon it at this time. The attention of gentlemen has been called to the general provisions of this bill by its reading, and I will say that the House will soon be called upon to determine what it will do in the future in regard to the education of young men for officers of the Army; whether we will double the capacity of the Academy at West Point, as recently recommended, or adopt the system proposed in this bill, or something like it, as recommended by the officers appointed by the Secretary of War last year to examine and report upon the subject. That system is that the education of Army officers shall hereafter be intrusted in part to such colleges, not to exceed two in any one State, as may be selected by the State Legislatures, officers of the Army being detailed to act as military professors, &c. That plan is recommended by many officers of the Army.

This bill is too important to be disposed of under the operation of the previous question, and I therefore ask that it may be made the special order for some day sufficiently distant for the bill in its present shape to be printed and placed in the hands of every member. I suggest that it be made the special order for the second Tuesday in January.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am not only opposed to this bill in toto, as being a new scheme to plant military colleges all over the country; but I am particularly opposed to making it a special order.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then I will move that the bill be postponed until the second Tuesday in January, without being made a special order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would inquire of the Chair what will be the position of this bill should it be postponed until the time named?

The SPEAKER. It will then come in behind all bills to be found on page 2 of the Calendar, whatever special orders may be made in the interim, the appropriation bills and the consideration of business in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WOOD. I would inquire of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] if he proposes to press the question at this time upon this measure? I desire to be heard upon it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have already moved that it be postponed until the second Tuesday in January, in order that it may be printed with the amendments proposed by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WOOD. This is one of the most important measures ever proposed in Congress, and we should have ample time for its discussion.

Mr. PRUYN. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] whether this bill is in conflict with, or supplementary to, the bill passed by Congress some years since, giving land to agricultural colleges?

Mr. GARFIELD. It in no way conflicts with it, and is not directly accessory to it; but still it will work in harmony with it, if carried out according to the true intention of the bill.

And I desire to express my regret that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] has pronounced against this bill, when he certainly cannot have had the opportunity to know its spirit.

Mr. CHANLER. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] whether this bill includes in it a provision for a similar system of education for the Navy?

Mr. GARFIELD. No, sir; it has nothing to do with that.

Mr. CHANLER. If the education of the masses for the purposes of national defense is the object of the bill, what objection can the gentleman have to authorizing the Government of the United States to establish in the harbors of this country school-ships for the education of a fit body of officers for the Navy?

Mr. GARFIELD. In answer to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANLER] I will say, in the first place, that the Committee on Military Affairs have no jurisdiction over the question of education for the Navy; and in the next place, these schools and colleges located in the interior will not be very favorably situated for the establishment of practice-ships for naval cadets.

Mr. PIKE. The present system of education for the Navy is quite sufficient.

Mr. CHANLER. As the Committee on Education and Labor has, in accordance with a bill of the gentleman himself, provided for a bureau of education, I wish to ask why this matter is made a subject of exclusive military consideration? In other words, why does a gentleman who has been so active in changing the whole system of national education by inaugurating a bureau to take charge of that subject hold in a corner this measure and keep it within the custody of the Committee on Military Affairs? Why is not the question of education for military purposes, as well as for the Navy, referred to this special bureau created on the gentleman's own suggestion?

Mr. GARFIELD. I cannot consent to go into a discussion of the bill now further than to say, in general, that the measure was drafted by an officer appointed by General Grant to consider this very subject, and his report was printed by order of General Grant when Secretary of War ad interim. The bill, therefore, comes to us with a recommendation entitling it to very careful consideration. I insist on my motion to postpone.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to ascertain from the gentleman from Ohio whether he intends, if the bill be now postponed, to give reasonable opportunity for its discussion when it shall again come up?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Gentlemen on this side desire to know whether they shall prepare themselves to discuss this bill, or whether it is to be passed under the operation of the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. There will be full opportunity for discussion.

Mr. ROSS. I move that the bill be laid on the table.

On the motion there were—ayes 60, noes 46.

Mr. GARFIELD called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. GARFIELD and ROSS were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 73, noes 40.

So the bill was laid on the table.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I congratulate the organ of the incoming Administration upon the support of the gentleman from Illinois on the other side, [Mr. ROSS.]

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill (S. No. 658) to relieve from disabilities Franklin J. Moses, a citizen of South Carolina; when the Speaker signed the same.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. SHELLABARGER asked and obtained indefinite leave of absence on account of the sickness of his wife.

WAR CLAIMS OF IOWA.

Mr. DODGE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1491) fixing the amount found to be due to the State of Iowa on account of certain claims against the United States; which was read a first and second time.

The preamble of the bill recites that Congress, by an act approved July 25, 1866, directed the President to appoint a commission to examine and report upon the claims of the State of Iowa for forage, transportation, subsistence, and clothing furnished by that State to volunteers; also, for the repayment of certain moneys expended by the State in raising, arming, equipping, paying, and subsisting certain troops of the State during the late rebellion; and also the claims of the State for certain forage procured and barracks built and turned over to the United States. It further recites that the commissioner appointed by the President has, after an examination of the claims, reported that there is due to the State of Iowa $229,848 23, and recommended the payment of that sum. The bill, therefore, provides that the amount so found due to that State shall be paid to it out of an appropriation hereafter to be made.

Mr. DODGE. I demand the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope this bill will not be passed until we have some information on the subject.

Mr. DODGE. We have the report of the committee.

Mr. ROSS. I raise the point of order that this is an appropriation bill, and should go to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. The bill states distinctly that the money is to be paid out of an appropriation hereafter to be made.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. That is an evasion of the rule which I hope the House will not tolerate—bringing in a bill in that way.

Mr. DODGE. I withdraw the previous question for the purpose of having the report read.

The report from the Committee on Military Affairs was read. The committee find that the report submitted by the commissioner, Brevet Major General Robert C. Buchanan, under the law of July 25, 1866, has been made after a faithful and careful examination, and that the vouchers have been properly audited. They therefore recommend that an appropriation be made for the claims as audited and recommended in the report of General Buchanan.

Mr. MAYNARD. Does the report of General Buchanan accompany this?

Mr. DODGE. It is printed—Miscellaneous Document No. 101—if the gentleman desires it read.

Mr. MAYNARD. No, sir.

Mr. CULLOM. I would ask the gentleman whether there is any special reason why this bill should pass? Why should not the money be paid under the general law?

Mr. DODGE. I have the report of General Buchanan.

Mr. CULLOM. I would like to have the report read, then.

The report was read, as follows:

COMMISSIONER'S OFFICE IOWA CLAIMS,
WASHINGTON, D. C., December 6, 1867.

The undersigned having been appointed by the President, under the act approved July 25, 1866, commissioner "to examine and report upon the claim of the State of Iowa for forage, transportation, subsistence, and clothing furnished by said State to certain volunteers of said State under command of Colonels Morledge and Edwards; also the claim of the State of Iowa for repayment of certain moneys paid by said State in raising, arming, equipping, paying, and subsisting certain troops of the State, maintained by the State on the southern and northwestern borders thereof, during the late rebellion; and also the claim of said State for compensation for certain forage procured and barracks built by the State on the northwestern border thereof, and turned over by the State to and used by the United States," has the honor to submit the following report:

These claims are for reimbursement of expenses incurred and payments made by the State in the employment of a State militia force to protect it against the depredations of Indians on the north, and bushwhacking rebels in the south, during a period of the rebellion when the United States Government was unprepared to furnish the troops necessary for that purpose.

After a careful examination of the act, and of the claims and their vouchers presented by the State, I became satisfied that it would not be possible or proper to apply to them the rules usually prescribed by the accounting officers of the Treasury for the settlement of military claims against the Government. The exigencies of the case demanded immediate action, and the exceptional circumstances under which they originated rendered these expenditures absolutely imperative, and would of themselves have justified a greater departure from the proper forms of the various vouchers than is found in them.

The troops employed were the regiments of Colonels Morledge, Edwards, and Bussey, on the southern border in 1861; the "southern border brigade" in 1862-63; "southwestern frontier companies" in 1861-62-63-64; miscellaneous companies in 1861, on southern border; the "northern frontier guards" in 1861; and the "northern border brigade" in 1862-63.

I shall not attempt to give a detailed history of the circumstances under which these several bodies of troops were called out, as they will be shown by the statements of his Excellency Governor Kirkwood, Colonel J. N. Dewey, State commissioner of claims, and the reports of the various agents and officers employed, all of which accompany this report. The Sioux Indians, very soon after the outbreak of the rebellion, showed a very strong disposition to hostilities, and caused intense alarm and excitement among the settlers in the northern and northwestern borders of the State. These settlers were mostly of foreign birth, only recently arrived in the country, and entirely unacquainted with the Indian character and habits, and hence the more easily excited and alarmed by the current reports of their treachery and barbarity.

"The alarm was such," says Governor Kirkwood, "that the people nearly en masse were leaving their homes, taking their families and such property as they conveniently could, and abandoning all else, and urgent appeals were made to me for protection." In this state of affairs, to afford such protection as was in the power of the State was an imperative duty with the Governor, and he discharged it faithfully by calling into the service of the State the various troops employed on its northern borders. They were retained only while their services could not be dispensed with, and as soon as they could be safely discharged they were mustered out. While in the service some of these troops built barracks and block-houses, and at the time of their discharge turned them over to the United States troops by whom they were relieved.

While this state of affairs existed in the northern section, armed rebels in Missouri and their sympathizers in the southern part of the State were strongly threatening its peace, and the Union men there were loudly calling for aid to protect themselves against bushwhackers, who in some instances penetrated far into the interior of the State, carrying off prisoners and committing their usual depredations. The Government was calling loudly for volunteers from the State to aid in the suppression of the rebellion, but, says Governor Kirkwood, "it was useless to expect men to volunteer to leave their homes and families unless they had some guarantee that these would be protected during their absence." Hence arose the necessity for the services of the regiments of Colonels Morledge, Edwards, and Bussey, as also the other organizations employed in the southern portion of the State.

These troops were accordingly "raised, armed, equipped, paid, and subsisted," in accordance with the provisions of an act of the Legislature of the State approved April 7, 1862, and hereunto appended, by which it is provided that "the officers and men shall receive the same pay and allowances as are allowed to like troops in the service of the United States."

In the examination of the question of reimbursement to the State of Iowa for the expenses incurred by these several bodies of troops two questions arise, by the answers to which the whole matter must be decided:

First. Was there such necessity for their employment as to justify their organization?

Second. Were the expenditures made under the several heads reasonable and proper, and in accordance with the spirit of the laws in such cases made and provided?

With regard to the necessity, the facts stated above show, in my opinion, that it was absolutely imperative. On the one border the lives and property of the inhabitants of the State were threatened by a sanguinary and savage foe; and on the other the integrity of the State itself as a member of the Union was in imminent jeopardy from armed traitors and rebels seeking its conquest. No one can doubt the necessity and propriety of employing these troops.

As to the expenditures, the Legislature, by the act referred to, directed that all accounts arising under the employment of these troops should be submitted, previous to payment, to a board of commissioners then in existence, whose duty it was to audit and allow all claims against the State. Fortunately the members of this board were intelligent and discreet, and consulted a rigid economy in their allowances, being somewhat controlled, perhaps, by the idea of the uncertainty of the amount being refunded by the Government. The board had plenary powers; its decisions were final, as no appeal could be taken from them, nor could any account be paid without its approval, with the amount allowed indorsed upon it, and verified by the signatures of its members. My examination of these accounts shows me that they are carefully made up in accordance with the laws of the State, verified on oath, and though not in the forms used by the Treasury Department, yet sufficiently like them for all practical purposes. I therefore did not attempt to apply to them the regulations of the accounting officers of the Treasury, for had this been possible, it did not seem likely that Congress would have provided by law for a commissioner "to examine and report upon" claims that could have been as well decided upon by those officers themselves. The letters of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Second Comptroller, hereto appended, sanction this opinion.

The regiments of Colonels Morledge and Edwards, and the company of Captain Jones, were called into service in 1861, and were employed, with the consent of Major General Pope, in active service in Missouri.

The report concludes with a statement of the claim taken from the pay-rolls and other documents. At the conclusion of the reading of the report, the morning hour expired.

CHINA MAIL STEAMSHIP SERVICE.

On motion of Mr. SCHENCK, the House proceeded to business on the Speaker's table.

The first business on the Speaker's table was Senate joint resolution (S. No. 104) relative to the ocean mail steamship service between the United States and China, authorized by act of Congress approved February 17, 1865; which was read a first and second time, and, on motion of Mr. FARNSWORTH, referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

BRIDGES ACROSS THE OHIO RIVER.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 622) in relation to bridges across the Ohio river; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. BINGHAM. * I move to refer the bill to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. ELIOT. I think it should go to the Committee on Commerce. I move that amendment.

Mr. BINGHAM. I think it ought to go to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. RAUM. I desire to put it on its passage.

Mr. BINGHAM. I hope not. It is too important to pass at once.

Mr. PHELPS. Gentlemen ought not to vote upon a question so important as this without knowing what they are voting upon. The passage of this bill would involve the Government at once in an expense of nearly half a million dollars in the shape of damages to a company which has commenced the construction of bridges under the existing law, for which amount the Government would be responsible to the company in the Court of Claims. It is well for gentlemen to know that in voting for this bill they vote to involve the Government in an expenditure of nearly half a million dollars. I hope the bill will be referred to a committee.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of War, with the approval of the President, to appoint a board of scientific engineers, to consist of not less than five nor more than seven, who shall report to the next session of Congress the proper width of span for railroad bridges across the Ohio river adapted to the wants of navigation and commerce upon that river, and provides that until Congress shall by law take action upon the report no bridge shall be erected over the said river. The board of engineers are also to examine the bridge across the Ohio river at Steubenville, and report whether it is any obstruction to the navigation of the river, and if so, to what extent, and what should be done to remedy such obstruction. The provisions of the bill are not to be applicable to the bridge now in process of construction at Louisville, which bridge shall not be less than four hundred feet span across the main channel of the river.

Mr. BINGHAM. Those who have attended to the reading of this bill will notice that it discriminates on its face in favor of the State of Kentucky and against the State of Ohio. It contains an express provision that its provisions shall not operate upon the bridge in process of construction at Louisville, Kentucky. It decides further as to the span requisite, to wit, four hundred feet. It then provides for a commission to determine against the bridge already completed across the Ohio river at Steubenville, and connecting by rail the cities of St. Louis and Cincinnati with the city of Pittsburgh, a structure that has cost nearly a million dollars.

Now, I desire that the bill shall be referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals, and let them examine into this question and report upon it, and satisfy this House why Congress should in advance discriminate in favor of Kentucky and against the State of Ohio, and why all our works should be stopped on the Ohio river, from its mouth to the southern border of the State, while the work is to go on in Kentucky, and why the commerce and trade of the whole Southwest should be secured to the State of Kentucky to the exclusion of the State of Ohio. I ask the House to consider further that a bill like this passed before without debate under the operation of the previous question. I think it is treatment to which the people of Ohio have not subjected themselves by their conduct in the past, and, for one, I protest against this discrimination in advance in favor of the interests of any State of this Union to the exclusion of my own State. The bill proposes to allow this commission to inquire concerning a bridge which has been fully completed and is now in use and in full operation, and to inquire what more is to be done in order to remove it, if you please, as an obstruction, to tear it down and destroy the interests of the great line of railroad extending from Pittsburgh to the city of St. Louis. I hope the reference will be made, so that justice may be done.

Mr. RAUM. Before the vote is taken upon this question, I would like to make some little explanation as to the course this subject has taken in the two Houses. It will be remembered that a joint resolution, which I had the honor of introducing, was passed by this House, making provision that no bridge hereafter to be constructed over the Ohio river should have a less span than five hundred feet over the main channel of the river. That joint resolution passed by a very large majority and went to the Senate. It was there referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and received very careful attention at the hands of that committee, and was resisted with a great deal of earnestness by certain Senators, and particularly by the Senators from West Virginia, and as a kind of compromise, and after thorough investigation of the subject, it was determined that the action of Congress should be postponed in reference to fixing the length of the span until there should be a survey made by competent engineers appointed by the War Department.

Now, sir, if these bridges thrown across the Ohio river are obstructions to the navigation of that great stream, as a matter of course it is proper that the Congress of the United States should interfere in behalf of the commerce of that great river; and before the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] took umbrage at the action of the Senate in discriminating, as he says, in favor of Kentucky as against his own State, he should have investigated the subject and explained the facts upon which the Senate acted when they excepted the bridge at the city of Louisville. Why, sir, nature has discriminated in favor of that bridge, not the Senate of the United States.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. RAUM. Certainly.

Mr. BINGHAM. What I want is a report to this House from the proper committee, which shall show the reason why the work in Kentucky shall be permitted to go on to completion, and the whole commerce of the Southwest thereby secured to the State of Kentucky, all the details being settled by congressional legislation, while the work in Ohio shall be suspended. You say that nature has made the discrimination. I want the matter referred to a committee, so that the committee may report to the House the facts which are necessary to enable us to act properly upon the subject.

Mr. MULLINS. Let it be referred to the committee of nature.

Mr. BINGHAM. Let it be referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals; that is the natural committee for it.

Mr. RAUM. Nature has discriminated in favor of Kentucky, instead of Ohio. By a rock-bound shore, on each side of the river, nature has fixed the greatest width for the span of the bridge at Louisville. Four hundred feet is the entire distance between the rocks at the point where this bridge is to be constructed.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] says that this bill proposes to discriminate against the Steubenville bridge. If he has examined the Senate report—which he may have done to his satisfaction—he must have discovered that the space at the base of the piers of the Steubenville bridge has been reduced by a surrounding of rip-rap to the extent of twenty feet, thus reducing the width of the channel between the piers forty feet.

Now, I would ask how the Senate and the House can act more intelligently upon this subject than upon the report of seven scientific engineers appointed by the War Department? I hope this bill will pass at this time. It has been thoroughly considered by the Senate and passed by that body.

Mr. KERR. I am very clear in my opinion that this bill should be referred as suggested by my friend from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM.] I think the subject-matter of this bill is one of very great importance to our entire country, and especially to the commerce carried on upon our great inland waters in the West. I think this bill should receive a more thorough investigation and inquiry at the hands of a committee than it has yet received. And I have no hesitation in saying further to this House that in my judgment the present bill is not right; that its recommendation as to the longest span of these bridges is not correct; that it proposes too great a length for the span. I think there ought to be a compromise between five hundred feet and three hundred feet, in order to accommodate alike or with some degree of equality all the interests of commerce, whether by rail or by river, which are involved in this proposition.

Now, a word in reference to the Louisville bridge. I think my distinguished friend from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] labors under a mistake in regard to the intention of this bill in relation to that bridge. The length of the longest span of that bridge is not fixed or altered at all by this bill; it was not controlled by any bill. The truth is, that the length of the span of that bridge was dictated by nature. It was regulated by the topography of the site of the bridge, not by engineers, not by laws of Congress, or the laws of Kentucky or of Indiana, but by the very form and shape of the spot over which it passes. The rocks that bound that channel have themselves determined the length of the span of that bridge, therefore it cannot be changed by this law. Should Congress now attempt to change the length of the span of that bridge it would have to change the topography of the earth there. And the span of that bridge, as it now stands, does not affect the channel of the Ohio river at all; it does not diminish its width or interfere with the natural course of commerce upon that river. That question, therefore, is not involved in this question of reference. I think the bill should be referred, not only to the end that the doubt suggested by my friend from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] may be removed, but to the further and greater and more important end that the House may be more fully advised as to the relative influence and effect of this proposed legislation upon all the interests of the country in connection with these bridges.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] entirely misapprehends the intent of this bill in its exception of the Louisville bridge. That exception was the result of no disposition to favor Kentucky, or to discriminate in favor of or against any section of the country. And so far as it increases railroad facilities or connections, or advances the interests of commerce by rail, it is more beneficial to the North and East than it is to the South or to Kentucky. It is certainly promotive of the general welfare and commercial development of the country. The real reason for that exception is the one I have already referred to. Besides, that bridge has been well high constructed under laws long since enacted, and to interfere now with its completion would work manifest injustice to the bridge company and render no compensating advantages to the public. It was, therefore, very properly excepted by the Senate from the operation of this bill.

I think it ought therefore to be referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals, to which, in my judgment, the subject properly belongs. The bill purports to be a general measure, designed to secure the establishment for all time of what may be called a national standard for the spans of these bridges across that river. If such a standard is to be established, it would seem to be very obviously just that it should embrace all the great rivers of the country, not the Ohio alone. Neither is it just that the erection of all bridges across the Ohio river should be forbidden, until the proposed commission report and Congress prescribes a uniform length of span, while the erection of bridges over the other great rivers is permitted to go on. There should be no sectionalism in this matter. Let the purposes of this commission be extended and made to embrace the Mississippi and other rivers; or if it be confined to the Ohio, then bridge enterprises long since projected in accordance with existing laws and now in process of erection ought to be allowed to go on.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I supposed there would be little or no opposition to the passage of this bill, and I am somewhat surprised that any opposition has been manifested. It will be recollected that the bill passed by the House and sent to the Senate was imperative in its terms, providing that no bridges should be constructed except with a span of at least five hundred feet in width. The Senate discussed that measure for a long period of time. The committee of that body to whom the subject was referred held meeting after meeting. They obtained reports on the subject from the ablest engineers in the country. The result of all the examination and consideration given to the question by the Senate was the bill which they have sent to us, proposing to submit the matter to a commission of able engineers, to be selected for the purpose by the War Department, I believe. I do not see why any one should object to this proposition.

Mr. BINGHAM. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORHEAD] will allow me to interrupt him, I desire to inquire whether the provision now contained in this joint resolution in relation to the railroad bridge completed above the city of Steubenville was included in the House bill at all?

Mr. RAUM. No, sir; it was not.

Mr. BINGHAM. So I understood.

Mr. RAUM. The Senate saw fit to include that.

Mr. MOORHEAD. The bill as passed by the Senate provides for the selection of engineers who, upon full examination, shall decide how the bridges shall be constructed. If there is any obstruction in the river, they will decide, I suppose, that that obstruction shall be removed. This appears to be a question between the navigation of the rivers and the crossing of the streams by railroads. Now, I am in favor of protecting the navigation of the rivers to the largest practicable extent, and I am at the same time opposed to preventing the railroads from crossing the streams. If these two interests conflict, each must to a certain extent yield to the other; we must adopt an arrangement satisfactory so far as possible to both. Now, it is a well-ascertained fact that these bridges can be constructed with spans of five hundred feet; and that, if constructed with spans of only three hundred feet, they are destructive to the interests of navigation. It being then entirely practicable to build bridges with a span of five hundred feet, their construction in this way is a mere question of the expenditure of a little more money; and I am in favor of requiring the railroad companies who are to cross the streams to make this additional expenditure rather than destroy the navigation of the rivers.

The bill, however, proposes to leave this question to the commission to be appointed. This commission will not ask us what their decision shall be. These men, to be selected on account of their scientific skill, are to decide this question.

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MOORHEAD. Yes, sir.

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky. Why could not the Committee on Roads and Canals, or any committee of this House to whom the question may be referred, summon before them these engineers and obtain all the information necessary to enable them to submit to the House a full report of the facts, with such a bill as would be satisfactory to the entire section of country interested? I desire to ask the gentleman further whether this bill does not propose to apply to the Ohio river a principle which the legislation of the country has applied to no other stream within the limits of the United States? Why should this principle be applied to the Ohio river, and no other?

Mr. MOORHEAD. I am glad the gentleman has propounded this inquiry. In answer to the first part of the question I would say that the Senate had this matter under consideration for weeks. I was called before their committee two or three times. I went over there day after day to consult with the members of the Senate. They were very much annoyed with this question. Any one who will examine the Globe of the last session will find that this subject was up day after day for weeks, being postponed time and again. The committee labored upon the subject, and the Senate labored upon it. The result was that they agreed upon this bill; and I suppose there is nearly as much wisdom in the Senate as in this House. Well, my friend from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] says that cannot be admitted, and on his account I take it back.

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky. The committee to whom it has been referred have had a number of these things before them.

Mr. MOORHEAD. They have; and I do not know but they had the gentleman from Kentucky there. They had before them a great many gentlemen, some of the best engineers of Kentucky. I know they had Colonel Warren and Mr. Roberts, an engineer on the Ohio river, and General Humphreys, also. They obtained a written report, but they failed to get information enough to satisfy them on the subject.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. The gentleman says it is ascertained that a railroad bridge can be built with a span of five hundred feet. Does he know of any such bridge in the United States?

Mr. MOORHEAD. I know one at Niagara of about a thousand feet span.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. A railroad bridge.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Yes; trains of cars run over it every day.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. That is a suspension bridge.

Mr. MOORHEAD. There is nothing said in this bill about the kind of bridge.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Be that as it may, I desire to know the main object of this bill. I do not understand it, and would be very glad if the gentleman would make a statement of the object.

Mr. MOORHEAD. It is just on account of this collision I speak of, between the navigation of the river and the railways that have to cross the river. The parties in favor of the protection of the navigation of the river say that it is obstructed by these piers, and for the purpose of ascertaining exactly what that measure of obstruction would be, the Senate, as I think wisely, has given us a bill referring the matter to a committee of scientific men.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I ask if the committee appointed by the War Department for the purpose of examining this matter have reported.

Mr. MOORHEAD. They have not been appointed, and will not be till this bill is passed.

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire to correct the gentleman's statement in one particular, about referring this matter to scientific men. By the passage of this bill the bridge at Louisville is expressly excepted from its operation.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I suppose the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KERR] had satisfied the gentleman from Ohio as to what nature had done at that point.

Mr. BINGHAM. No, sir; he has not satisfied me. I am only correcting the gentleman's statement.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I hope the gentleman will not undertake to override the laws of nature.

Mr. BINGHAM. The case of the bridge at Louisville is not to be referred to scientific gentlemen, but is decided in this bill. It is excepted from the operation of the bill.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Before I leave the subject there is one other point to which I wish to refer. I have some facts on this subject that I think it proper should be laid before the House. I know there will be a question raised here about vested rights, about certain bridges having been commenced and the piers having been put into the river since the last adjournment of Congress. Now I have some particular information on that subject that I do not know that any body else has, and being a member of Congress, and feeling it my duty to give the House all the light on the subject I can, I think it very proper I should state it.

During the last fall I was called upon by an engineer in charge of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, who spoke to me about the construction of a bridge at Parkersburg, and another at Belair, below Wheeling. He said he was going to put in the piers. I informed him that at the last session of Congress the Senate had passed a bill, which was pending before the House, referring the subject of bridging the Ohio river to a scientific commission; that I had no doubt the bill would be passed among the earliest actions of the House, and that would send the whole question to a scientific commission. I therefore advised him not to build the piers until that commission should decide the question, unless he should make them at least five hundred feet span. He laughed at me, and said that was a reason why he was in more of a hurry to get his piers in. He wanted to establish this very vested right that has been spoken of here in such eloquent terms.

Mr. TWICHELL. I would like to know of my friend if a span of three hundred feet would not be as wide as the navigation of the Ohio river is at its narrowest point?

Mr. MOORHEAD. Yes, at low water; but at high water it is from shore to shore. The channel is just as wide as the banks of the river are apart. Some of our coal-boat tows are two hundred and fifty feet in width, and they cannot run through a channel of two hundred and fifty feet.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. I trust the House will adopt the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM,] and refer this bill to the Committee on Roads and Canals. In the first place, no injury can accrue to any party by such a reference, but rather it will benefit all concerned. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORHEAD] has said that one interest must yield to another in this matter. By reference to the committee, and only by reference, can it be properly ascertained how far these interests shall yield each to the other, so that the greatest good may result to the whole country. The friends of river navigation and the friends of railroads can each present their views before the committee, and the committee thus be enabled to reach such conclusions as will be satisfactory to all. Any other course, it seems to me, would work wrong and injustice—wrong which, I am satisfied, this House does not wish to inflict.

There is another feature in connection with this bill to which I desire to call the attention of the House, and that is that if this commission be appointed it shall report to the next session of Congress. Well, now, when will the next session of Congress be held? Probably the Forty-First Congress may hold a brief session on the 4th of March next, but this commission, if appointed, will not have time to prepare a report and submit it at that session, and it must necessarily go over until December of next year. The whole of next summer will be lost so far as this bridge-building interest is concerned, and, as a consequence, the bridge now erected across the river at Steubenville, in which the Central Pennsylvania railroad is more especially interested, will have the advantage all the time, while the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, which has now two bridges in progress of erection, will be compelled to stop their work in the erection of bridges, and their interest in the transportation of the country will suffer, while the Pennsylvania Central Railroad Company will enjoy that interest for a year longer.

Now, it is said that the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company has commenced the erection of its bridges since the adjournment of the last session of Congress. To my certain knowledge that road has been preparing materials and making ready for building the bridges for the last two years, and they have already expended nearly half a million dollars in connection with those bridges. They have located their piers so as to interfere as little as possible with the channel of the river, thus securing the best draught of water, locating the piers so that the water will draw fairly between them; and it is generally understood that the three hundred feet span which they are providing is sufficient to accommodate all the craft which can navigate the river at the ordinary stages of water.

I trust, therefore, in order that justice may be done to all interests and to all parties, that this bill may be referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals, where the parties interested can be heard and the committee can decide how far the navigation interest of the river must yield to the internal commerce of the country, and how far the internal commerce of the country shall yield to the navigation of the river. And when they shall be fairly heard I am satisfied the committee will not report favorably upon this bill. I trust it will be referred.

Mr. NIBLACK. I was not in the Hall when this bill was read, and I have to trust to what I have heard in this discussion in considering its provisions. My first impulse was to vote to refer it to the Committee on Roads and Canals, so that it may have further investigation; but the little discussion I have heard has impressed me with the conviction that the best thing that those who are opposed to the legislation which has heretofore passed Congress upon the subject of bridges can do is to advocate the passage of the bill in its present form.

During the last session of Congress, when this question of bridging the Ohio river at Paducah, I believe, was before the House, I felt constrained to oppose the passage of the bill. I took the position then—a position to which I still adhere—that all bridges constructed upon any plan which is generally in use upon the great rivers of the country are obstructions to commerce, and must of necessity be so. Representing as I do a district which is bounded upon one side by one hundred and seventy miles of the Ohio river, it becomes to the people of my district an important and to some extent a vital question. It will be with regret that I shall witness the construction of any bridges across the Ohio river below the falls of the Ohio, at the city of Louisville, to which reference has been made in this discussion; but I presume, sir, that the railroad interests of the country will have sufficient influence to obtain from Congress and from the Legislatures of the States legislation sufficient to enable them to bridge that river at almost any point they choose. At all events, I think I am justified in making this statement, from the history of these bridge questions before Congress and before the State Legislatures.

If, therefore, we are to have bridges, it is important, at least to those I represent, that they shall be constructed in a manner that will produce the least possible obstruction to the navigation of that great river. As at present advised I should not vote under any circumstances for a bill allowing a bridge to be constructed across that river of a span less than five hundred feet. I am told that bridges can be constructed with a span of less length, and if properly constructed the injury to the navigation of the river would be very slight indeed. It may be that bridges might be constructed with a less span than five hundred feet, but that is a subject which I believe has not been fully investigated here; at least it is a subject which the public has not very maturely considered as yet; it is a subject upon which comparatively few persons have information.

In view, then, of this position of things, I know of nothing better to be done than to appoint a commission, as I am informed this bill proposes to do, to investigate this subject and to determine how much span is required for any of the points at which it is proposed to build bridges. If, therefore, we cannot defeat this legislation which we believe to be injurious to the commerce of the Ohio river, I think we should do the next best thing, and mitigate the evil, so far as we are able to do so. After hearing both sides of the question I am prepared, contrary to my first impression, to support this bill and to vote against its reference, because I believe that in the present condition of the legislation of the country, and considering the fact that this is the short session of Congress, to refer this bill is practically to defeat it.

Mr. RANDALL. It seems to me, with the slight information I have been able to obtain during the discussion of this question at this time, that this is a most important subject. As has been stated, it is in some degree a conflict between the river navigation and the railroad transportation of the West. It therefore involves immense interests, and should have due and full consideration from this House before we here, as the Representatives of the people, place it beyond our power to remedy any wrong which may result from legislation. Therefore, as the safe course, as the proper course to pursue, I shall vote for a reference of this bill, so that a proper and appropriate committee of this House may have an opportunity to examine the subject and to report thereupon. The proper committee, as I understand it, is the Committee on Roads and Canals—a committee constituted under the rules of this House, and to which the consideration of this subject properly belongs. In my opinion no interest can possibly suffer by a short delay, which will give an opportunity for examination, so that great and material interests of this country may not be injured by precipitating indiscreet action on our part. As one of the Representatives of parties who may be more or less interested in this matter, I desire that a reference shall be made, and that the subject may be fully examined and reported upon.

Mr. CLARKE, of Ohio. I do not know what danger there may be in this bill, and I do not know but I may ultimately support it. But if this proposed commission should be raised it would perhaps tend in some degree to change the action of Congress, and we might ultimately find ourselves in this condition: with the Ohio bridged from Pittsburgh to its mouth with bridges of three hundred feet span. The river is now very largely used for floating and transporting merchandise in masses of large bulk, which, in that case, would be rendered impossible. And if we deprive it of that capacity we will destroy a very important interest of the western country, and especially of southwestern Ohio. When this commission shall have been appointed it will probably go out to the Ohio river, and be there visited by those in favor of the one and the other scheme of bridging the river, and its recommendations would tend to influence the minds of those who are not familiar with the capacity of that stream and the purposes for which nature seems to have designed it.

I am opposed to any bridge being constructed over that river with a span of less than five hundred feet, and I hope the time will come when the bridges already constructed will be required to extend their spans to that length. Those familiar with the navigation of that river know that those bridges already erected are a serious detriment to the navigation. The coal transportation down the river is seriously impeded by them, and in consequence of the increased difficulty of navigation the price of coal all along the lower part of the river is largely enhanced. An ordinary fleet of boats loaded with coal cannot pass at night through the spaces afforded by those bridges, but must tie up till daylight—

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. I would like to ask the gentleman what is the usual width of the coal-tows passing down the river?

Mr. CLARKE, of Ohio. I understand that they go down sometimes with a front of two hundred and fifty feet.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. The gentleman's information is very different from mine. I understand that they never run more than four barges abreast, each barge being from twenty-five to thirty feet in width, making a total breadth of one hundred to one hundred and twenty feet.

Mr. CLARKE, of Ohio. I know that fleets arriving in the night at one of those bridges are frequently obliged to tie up till daylight in order to go through safely; and if they arrive at the time of a slight storm on the river, they are compelled to await a calm to pass through with safety. This is a specimen of the obstruction experienced on that river by a species of navigation which is of the utmost importance.

Mr. MILLER. I desire to ask the gentleman whether there is on that river any bridge with a span such as he advocates?

Mr. CLARKE, of Ohio. There is at Cincinnati a bridge with a span of one thousand feet—a substantial bridge capable of bearing any required burden; a structure which is not only no embarrassment to the river, but an embellishment to it. If the railroad companies would construct such spans as that they would have all the facilities they can reasonably desire, while the navigation of the river would not be interfered with.

Mr. MILLER. Is that a railroad bridge, or is it used only by foot passengers, carriages, &c.

Mr. CLARKE, of Ohio. The street cars pass over it, and it is hourly subjected to greater weight than would pass over any railroad bridge that might be constructed on the river either above or below that point. There is no question about the practicability of constructing such a span; there is no question about its ability to bear all the burden required for railroad transportation. The only question is that of cost. Shall we sacrifice the navigation of that great river for the sake of saving a few thousand dollars to certain railroad corporations? I trust not; and of all corporations save us from that to which the gentleman from West Virginia has alluded—a corporation that now holds within its grasp so large a portion of the carrying and passenger trade of the country, and to whose control I hope we shall not much longer be required to submit. I am willing to give to these railroad corporations every facility which they can reasonably ask; but I do not want to surrender to their control interests of such grave importance to every man, woman, and child in the country. Why, sir, the fuel that is to warm the people of southern Ohio depends upon the free navigation of that river; and if we authorize the construction of these bridges with but three hundred feet span I cannot tell the extent of the injurious consequences which may result. Whatever may be done I trust we shall not allow a span of less than five hundred feet upon that river.

Mr. DELANO. Mr. Speaker, I do not venture to express any opinion as to the practicability of erecting a railroad bridge with a five hundred feet span so as to be safe for passengers. I do not profess to have sufficient knowledge as to the science of bridge-building to undertake to say whether with a span of five hundred feet there would be such security to the lives of railroad travelers as to justify the attempt. But as it is a new experiment I submit that legislators, before giving their sanction to such an experiment, should be well advised that it can probably be made successful; for it would be unfortunate if we should have to learn by the sacrifice of human life that such a span cannot be built with safety to travel. So much I desire to say because the object of this bill is to establish hereafter a span of five hundred feet and to hazard the lives of travelers by an affirmative decision as to the practicability of such a span with a proper regard to safety.

Last session there was introduced in this House, and considered under the operation of the previous question, a resolution proposing to require in the construction hereafter of bridges across the Ohio river a span of five hundred feet. Why the Ohio river was specially selected, and why the rule was made applicable to future bridges, when there was then in progress at Louisville, low down on the Ohio, a bridge with a span of four hundred feet, I could not comprehend, unless the object was to force railroad travel across the Ohio at that point to the advantage of certain railroad interests on the other side of the river and in an easterly direction. I fought that proposition, but it was passed and went to the Senate, and the result is, I believe, the proposition now before us.

Now, what is this proposition? Let us look at it for a single moment. It is that a commission shall be appointed to inquire what span ought to be adopted on the Ohio river, still confining this enterprise to that river, while all along the great Mississippi, which lies west of the Ohio, no such experiment is to be made and no such plan is to be adopted. I leave members to inquire why it is confined to the Ohio river. I do not understand it. But not only is it confined to the Ohio, but this bill contains a provision that the four hundred feet span at Louisville may continue. The work on all the rest of the bridges must be suspended and be postponed indefinitely, waiting the slow progress of this commission. It is an insidious, indirect way of accomplishing what a straightforward fight could not accomplish, and what the parties who sought to accomplish by a straightforward fight were defeated in. It is an outrage that the fine bridge at Stenbenville, near the district of my colleague, [Mr. BINGHAM,] should be subject to the criticism of this question of four hundred or five hundred feet span, while you permit a bridge to be built near the mouth of the river with a span of four hundred feet. It is an outrage that ought not to be perpetrated by this Congress.

I trust, therefore, with this simple statement of the question, that the House will refer the matter to one of its committees. My colleague [Mr. BINGHAM] has pressed its reference to the Committee on Roads and Canals. That is the legitimate committee to take charge of the question, in my opinion. I think we shall have from that committee a recommendation of some action not dictated by local interest or corporate interest, but which shall rest upon sound principles of equity and justice. I feel sure, if the House can understand this question, the reference will be made without hesitation.

Mr. CLARKE, of Ohio. I desire to ask the gentleman if he understands that those who propose the five hundred feet span propose also to except the bridge at Louisville from the operation of that restriction?

Mr. DELANO. I do.

Mr. BINGHAM. The bill makes the exception.

Mr. DELANO. Allow me to call my colleague's attention to the fact that the bill in its present form orders a scientific commission first to determine what span ought to be adopted hereafter. It then proposes to suspend all structures across the river until the commission shall report. It then authorizes the commission to examine and see whether the bridge at Steubenville is or is not an obstruction, and then, to accomplish the indirect and insidious purpose of these parties, it makes an exception in the case of the Louisville bridge and allows that to be completed. That is what the bill is, and what it means.

Mr. CLARKE, of Ohio. I can only say I do not concur in that exception by any means.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is the point.

Mr. DELANO. Let me read one of the provisions of the bill. It provides "that the provisions of this bill shall not be applicable to the bridge now in process of construction at Louisville, which bridge shall not be less than four hundred feet span in the clear across the channel." It is manifestly an insidious effort to secure the building of a bridge at Louisville of four hundred feet span, and hereafter to inhibit forever the building of bridges of a like span across the river at any other point. You may go up the stream, where it would seem natural that the span might be shorter, and there, if you can get a proper report, such as is contemplated here, you may make a five hundred feet span; but near the mouth of the river, in the mean time, we will allow a structure with a four hundred feet span for the benefit of certain corporations or interests. That is the question, and its barefacedness ought to subject it to a proper disposition, and that, I think, is the one suggested by my colleague, [Mr. BINGHAM.]

Mr. KERR. I desire to say, in reply to what has fallen from my friend from Ohio in reference to the confinement of this bill to the Ohio river, that it will be remembered by the House that while the bill excepts from its operation the Louisville bridge, it also and equally excepts all the bridges that are in process of erection on all of the western rivers, so that the Louisville bridge is not the only exception. It is only one of the exceptions. The bill applies to and embraces all the other enterprises of like character throughout the entire country, except on the Ohio river. For this additional reason, I submit, it is unfair; it is not national in its character; it is not such a bill as ought to pass.

Mr. CARY. Mr. Speaker, I cannot see any invidiousness in this bill in reference to the Louisville bridge that is exempted, when it is understood that the channel at that place is not and never can be over four hundred feet wide. We have a canal around the falls which was built to aid the commerce of that river in passing up and down.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will my colleague allow an inquiry?

Mr. CARY. Certainly.

Mr. BINGHAM. Does my colleague wish to be understood as making the statement to this House that at the highest water there is no more than four hundred feet of navigable channel at the point where this bridge is located at Louisville?

Mr. CARY. I mean to be understood as saying that when they pass the falls at Louisville there is but four hundred feet at any tide between the rocks where it is safe to pass.

Mr. BINGHAM. My question is whether the gentleman means to state to the House that at no stage of water is there a navigable channel at the point occupied by the bridge at Louisville wider than four hundred feet?

Mr. CARY. I mean to state that unless the whole country round is covered with water that is the fact. If it is ever over four hundred feet in width it is an exception, and that exception is when the whole country round is under water. So that this attempt on the part of my colleague to create an impression in this House that this is for the benefit of Indiana or Kentucky, or both combined, and against the State of Ohio, is not borne out by the facts. I wish members of the House to understand the facts. And so far as the Steubenville bridge is concerned, it has cost already in damages and in obstructions to commerce more than the interest on the cost of building it.

Mr. DELANO. Will my colleague allow me to make an inquiry?

Mr. CARY made a gesture of assent.

Mr. DELANO. I understand—I do not assert the fact, because I have no positive knowledge—but I understand that there is a pier within the span of four hundred feet at the Louisville bridge.

Mr. CARY. I understand that that is not the fact. If you were to require that there should be a span of one thousand feet at Louisville, it would not increase the width of the river for purposes of navigation over four hundred feet. That is what I mean to be understood as saying: that four hundred feet is all that can be used for navigation. And so far as Ohio is concerned, I say in behalf of my constituents and of my colleague's constituents, who are interested in bridges on the upper Ohio, that we are as much interested in the navigation at Louisville being unobstructed as we are in the upper Ohio being unobstructed, and more interested. It is not, then, for any such reason that we are in favor of making this exception.

But, Mr. Speaker, why refer this bill? Will the Committee on Roads and Canals be any better posted than we are now? This bill of the Senate proposes to refer the matter to a commission to determine how wide the bridges should be made upon the Ohio river so as not seriously to obstruct navigation. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. PHELPS] says that the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad company have already spent $500,000 in building the bridge at Belair, and I understand that they have a large force of hands employed to continue that work, in order, if possible, to render it necessary for Congress to yield to their demands.

Mr. PHELPS. They are building two bridges.

Mr. CARY. And another one is to be built at Cincinnati. And the Board of Trade of Cincinnati, and all the insurance companies and all persons interested in the navigation of that river, unless connected with railroads, say that those bridges are and will be an obstruction. Suppose they have spent $500,000. I say that if it is necessary we should pay them that $500,000 to remove the obstruction, it will be better for us to do it than to wait until there are four or five bridges constructed over the river which it will be necessary for the General Government to remove because they are obstructions to the navigation of the river. Let us refer the matter to a commission, as this bill proposes. It does not say a word about a five hundred feet span, but it provides that the question shall be referred to a competent corps of engineers to determine how wide the bridges ought to be over that river so as not to obstruct commerce. Shall we have any more light on that subject until the commission are appointed and report? Can the Committee on Roads and Canals tell us anything?

This measure was before Congress and was fully discussed at the last session. We cannot have any more light upon the subject than we have now without the appointment of a commission? Let us suspend the work on the bridges over that river. Why, the commerce on that river is worth five times more than all the railroads that ever proposed to cross it. We know that at the bridge already constructed, that splendid structure, the Steubenville bridge, boats are compelled to lie up there over night, and that they cannot get through without danger to the property. One man who ships coal from Pittsburg to Cincinnati testifies, and his testimony is on record, that the obstruction of the navigation of the river by that single bridge has cost him $10,000 a year in getting his coal to market. When the Ohio river is high, and the coal is going down the river, there is a strong current, and you have piers within three hundred feet of each other, and it creates such a current around the piers that it is impossible to get through with the barges until the river falls; and when the river falls so that they can get through they are in danger of running upon sand bars upon one side or the other.

They now avail themselves of the time when the water is high, in order to get down barges of coal, iron, salt, and other articles that are sent down the river. But when the river is high these bridges constitute such an obstruction that the barges are compelled to tie up. And then the additional expense for insurance that is charged upon commerce on account of the bridge at Steubenville is more than the interest upon the cost of its construction. I am not opposed to railroads, for we are all interested in them. But let us keep the great channels of commerce God has given us open for the whole people; and that cannot be done with these narrow-span bridges. One reason why gentlemen are disposed to impress upon this House the fact that there is some discrimination in favor of the Louisville bridge is, I infer, that they want to refer this bill to a committee, so that those interested in the construction of these bridges can go on night and day in their construction, until they render all action on the part of Congress nugatory and void, or else involve the nation in the expense of removing those obstructions.

Mr. BINGHAM. I now call the previous question.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Will the gentleman withdraw the call for the previous question for a few minutes?

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly, I will withdraw that motion, and yield to the gentleman for five minutes.

Mr. MOORHEAD. As I understand it, the first question will be upon the amendment to the motion to refer. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the words "Committee on Commerce," and inserting the words "Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads." I do not see why the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads should be over-slaughed. But I want to say to those members of this House who are with me upon this subject that I shall vote against any reference of this bill, and hope that it will pass as it now stands. Still, if it is to be referred, I do not see why the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads should be over-slaughed in the matter of reference. The bill, as it passed the House, originated in that committee. It went to the Senate, and was referred by that body to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. And I now hold in my hand the report upon that subject of the chairman of the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, being Senate Document No. 168. It was referred to that committee in this House; it was referred to that committee in the Senate; and I think it is the proper committee to whom the subject should be referred now, if it is to be referred at all, in order that they may see that the mails are carried across the stream. I do not see why that committee should be over-slaughed, particularly when it is proposed to refer this bill to a committee that meets scarcely once a year; that is, the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Unfortunately the manner in which the business of this House has been conducted has been such as to throw all the business into the hands of but few committees, while the work devolved upon the other committees has been merely nominal. The Committee on Roads and Canals is heard from hardly once in a session; it is seldom mentioned, unless some member wishes to consign some measure to the "tomb of the Capulets," when he moves to refer it to the Committee on Roads and Canals. I am opposed to any reference of this bill at this time. But if it is to be referred I hope my amendment will be adopted, and that it will be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Now, one word in reply to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DELANO,] who always speaks eloquently, and who always speaks in a very argumentative and convincing manner, so much so that he would almost induce the House to believe that there had been—I hardly know what—larceny, or burglary, or some great crime committed in connection with this matter. He referred to the insidiousness of the men who have moved in this matter. He spoke of the gross outrages in connection with this matter, in tones of denunciation that almost took the glass roof off the Capitol.

Now, I want to call the House back to its sober senses in relation to this subject. What is there at all insidious in this bill? The conclusion to which the Senate arrived, after discussing this subject for weeks, was to send the matter to a board of seven scientific men, selected for their peculiar knowledge on this subject. Yet the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DELANO] would induce this House to believe that some men, or some set of men, had committed a gross outrage, and it was necessary that they should be immediately arrested for it. Now, I do not understand the necessity of using such language on such a subject and upon such an occasion as this.

I do not think there was anything to call it out. I am sorry it was indulged in; and I am sorry I have found it necessary to call the attention of the House to that part of the gentleman's argument; for I know he always speaks convincingly; he has convinced me very often—sometimes almost against my will. I have nothing further to say.

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire merely to answer the question which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORHEAD] asks. The Committee on Roads and Canals is the appropriate committee to which this reference should be made. The construction of a bridge is the construction of a road; and if there is anything that is at all pertinent to the business of this committee it is precisely the bill which it is now proposed to refer to them. I desire, however, to say further that the gentleman has no right to assume that a standing committee of this House, when a measure is referred to it for consideration, will not discharge its duty; nor is it right for him to intimate that this committee is not quite as competent to investigate this question—a question altogether germane to the duties devolved upon it by the rules—as any other committee of the House.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I made no insinuation against the competency of the committee.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman intimated that the committee would not attend to its duties. I say that he assumed what he had no right to assume with reference to the committee, especially when it has at its head the honorable gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. COOK,] who understands these western interests, and who, when he comes to examine the subject, will doubtless consider the question whether, if it be right thus to fetter the commerce in transit by rail across the Ohio, it would not be equally right to fetter by like restrictions the commerce in transit across the Mississippi and the Missouri. I desire to have the subject referred to this committee because it has at its head an honorable gentleman who stands in no wise committed on the one side or the other of this question, and who, I undertake to say, understands the interests which the people of the Mississippi valley have in this controversy quite as well as any gentleman in this House.

Mr. COOK. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. COOK. Mr. Speaker, I have no interest in this question and no desire to undertake the labor of investigating it. I wish merely to correct a misapprehension into which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORHEAD] seems to have fallen in saying that the Committee on Roads and Canals hold a meeting but once a year. We have met at least once a week during the last and the preceding session of Congress, have reported quite a number of bills, and have presented several elaborate reports upon subjects which we were directed by the House to investigate. We have not been so lazy as the gentleman thinks.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will conclude, Mr. Speaker, by repeating in the hearing of the House the statement which I made in my opening remarks, that, in spite of all that can be said by any man on this subject, the effect of the bill, if it be passed by the House in the form in which it now stands, will be to shut out for the time being every city and town in the State of Ohio from the benefits of commerce by rail with the southwest, and to give that commerce exclusively to the city of Louisville. This is a discrimination which I trust the House will not make until, by an elaborate report from its appropriate committee, it is fully informed as to the wisdom and justice and equity of such a proceeding. I now call the previous question, and I hope that the motion to refer the bill to any other committee than the Committee on Roads and Canals will be voted down.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The first question was upon the amendment to the amendment, proposing to strike out "Commerce" and insert "Post Office and Post Roads," so as to refer the bill to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

The amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

The question next recurred upon the amendment, to strike out "Roads and Canals" and insert "Commerce," so as to refer the bill to the Committee on Commerce.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The question then recurred upon the motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

The motion was agreed to; there being—ayes one hundred and nine, noes not counted.

So the bill was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. BINGHAM moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON REVOLUTIONARY CLAIMS.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, I ask to be excused from further service on the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection, the gentleman will be excused.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. HAMILTON to fill the vacancy caused by the retirement of Mr. TROWBRIDGE.

ALTA VELA.

Mr. PHELPS, by unanimous consent, presented the petition of citizens of Baltimore, Maryland, relative to the claims of the Government and of citizens of the United States to the Island of Alta Vela; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. PHELPS. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be, and are hereby, instructed to inquire into the alleged injuries and outrages sustained by Abraham B. Patterson and P. de Murguiondo, citizens of Maryland, in their forcible eviction by the authorities of St. Domingo from the guano islet of Alta Vela in October, 1860, and by other citizens of the United States, agents of the said Patterson & Murguiondo, in the assaults, imprisonments, and other trespasses accompanying and succeeding said eviction, also committed by said authorities, and whether any, and what, action of Congress is required to protect the rights and redress the wrongs of American citizens abroad, to vindicate from dishonor the American flag, and to maintain the lawful jurisdiction of the United States; with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. UPSON. I object.

ADJOURNMENT TILL MONDAY.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. MAYNARD. I hope not. To-morrow is private bill day, and we will have few private bill days during this session.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. All members have business at the Departments.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 99, noes 24.

Mr. HIGBY demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCOTFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEGAL-TENDER NOTES.

Mr. BROOMALL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1492) to regulate the value of United States legal-tender notes, and for their redemption; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

ACCOUNTS OF INDIAN AGENTS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with the act of Congress of March 2, 1867, tabular statements of accounts with Indian agents to June 30, 1868; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The accompanying documents are voluminous, as the House will see, and it will decide whether they shall be printed or not.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move that the question of printing be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The motion was agreed to.

FORT SNELLING RESERVATION.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting papers relative to the sale of the Fort Snelling reservation; which were referred to the Committee on Military affairs and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. FOX, Mr. GARFIELD, and Mr. BUCKLAND were granted leave of absence for one week.

F. A. GIBBONS.

On motion of Mr. MORRELL, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the Committee on Agriculture of the papers in the case of F. A. Gibbons, and the substitution of other papers.

RECESS.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, at the suggestion of many members, I offer my resolution in reference to a recess. Gentlemen wish the matter settled some way or the other. I propose an adjournment from Monday, the 21st instant, to Tuesday, the 5th of January next, not the 15th, as the papers have had it. I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio, chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, who desires to propose another time, and after that has been done, unless remarks are made requiring an answer, I will demand the previous question.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring.) That when the two Houses of Congress adjourn on Monday, the 21st instant, they adjourn to meet on Tuesday, the 5th day of January, 1869.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have to say in behalf of my committee that they know there is an abundance of business demanding the attention of the House, without reference to the general appropriation bills, which we were informed the other day could not be reported until after the holidays. Independently of everything else there are two special orders having precedence: one the tariff bill, which was under consideration in the Committee of the Whole at the last meeting of Congress, and the other the general tax bill, both of them in the Committee of the Whole ready to be proceeded with, and in regard to both of which the House in the Committee of the Whole has already been engaged in their consideration. I know we must adjourn necessarily for the holidays. That is a foregone conclusion. It would be idle, as every one understands, to undertake to keep Congress here, but considering the shortness of this session, it does seem to me that we ought to run business up to the last possible convenient time before Christmas, and to resume it at as early a day as practicable afterward. Considering the whole question in my committee this morning, the subject having been broached already by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, I was instructed to move an amendment to his resolution when it came up, modifying it slightly as to dates, substituting Wednesday, the 23d, as the day on which the House will adjourn, and January 4 as the time for reassembling; that is, to adjourn on the second day before Christmas and reassemble on the first Monday after New Year. The effect of adjourning on the Monday before will be to send everybody off, as we know by experience, about Thursday of the preceding week.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. They will begin to go away about the middle of the week.

Mr. SCHENCK. They will begin to go away during the week preceding, whereas we may secure a solid week's work if we postpone the adjournment until two days before Christmas, as that will tend to keep gentlemen in their places. However, I do not rise to argue the matter. Every gentleman can judge for himself from past experience. I move the amendment which I have indicated to the pending resolution.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I will simply state, so far as I am personally concerned, that I am indifferent as to what day may be fixed, for I expect to be here during most of the recess; but I wish the House to decide between the times that have been proposed. If gentlemen think they can get home by starting on Wednesday, I am content to see the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio adopted. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 63, noes 78.

Mr. MULLINS and Mr. HIGBY demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—ayes 76, nays 91, not voting 54; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Beaman, Benjamin, Bingham, Boyden, Buckland, Roderick R. Butler, Churchill, Cobb, Coburn, Corley, Cullom, Delano, Deweese, Dickey, Donnelly, Eckley, Eggleston, Eln, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferry, French, Garfield, Gravelly, Griswold, Haughey, Heaton, Higby, Hooper, Chester D. Hubbard, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jencks, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kellogg, Kelsey, Ketcham, Kitchen, Lash, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Mallory, Marvin, Maynard, McCarthy, McCormick, Mercer, Moorhead, Morrell, Mullins, Niblack, O'Neill, Paine, Peters, Pettis, Polesley, Price, Raum, Schenck, Shanks, Spaulding, Starkweather, Stokes, Stover, Taylor, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, William Williams, Windom, and Woodbridge—76.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Archer, Arnold, Atwell, Baker, Beck, Benton, Blair, Boutwell, Bowen, Boyer, Brooks, Broomall, Burr, Cake, Callis, Cary, Chandler, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cist, Cook, Dawes, Dixon, Driggs, Edwards, Eldridge, Ferriss, Fields, Fox, Getz, Glossbrenner, Goldaday, Gove, Hill, Holman, Hopkins, Hotchkiss, Hubbard, Thomas L. Jones, Kerr, Knott, Koontz, Loughridge, Marshall, Miller, Moore, Mungen, Myers, Newcomb, Newsham, Norris, Orth, Perham, Phelps, Pike, Poland, Pomeroy, Prince, Pruyn, Randall, Robertson, Robinson, Seofield, Sigreaves, Smith, Stewart, Sypher, Taber, Taffe, Thomas, Tift, John Trimble, Lawrence S. Trimble, Trowbridge, Twichell, Unson, Van Aernam, Van Aukens, Burt Van Horn, Van Trump, Van Wyck, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Whittemore, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Wood, Woodward, and Young—91.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Allison, Delos R. Ashley, Bailey, Banks, Barnes, Barnum, Beatty, Blackburn, Blaine, Bolcs, Bromwell, Buckley, Benjamin F. Butler, Cornell, Covode, Dockery, Dodge, Goss, Grover, Haight, Halsey, Hamilton, Harding, Hawkins, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Johnson, Alexander H. Jones, Laffin, Lincoln, Logan, Lynch, McCullough, McKee, Morrissey, Nicholson, Nunn, Pierce, Pile, Plants, Roots, Ross, Sawyer, Selye, Shellabarger, Stevens, Stone, Robert T. Van Horn, Vidal, Ward, Thomas Williams, and John T. Wilson—54.

So the amendment was rejected.

The question then recurred on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I suggest to my colleague that he make it the Friday before the Monday indicated, for making it Monday is really providing for an adjournment on the Friday before, and we might as well say so in the resolution. It is really an adjournment one week before Christmas, and why not say so in the resolution, and not by fraud before the people pretend to adjourn three or four days later than we do.

Mr. BALDWIN. I move that the resolution be laid upon the table.

Mr. HIGBY demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion to lay upon the table was disagreed to.

The resolution was then adopted.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. McDonald, its Chief Clerk, notifying the House that that body had indefinitely postponed a bill (H. R. No. 1484) to relieve from disabilities Franklin J. Moses, of South Carolina.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

The next business upon the Speaker's table was Senate joint resolution No. 170, in relation to the library of the Department of Agriculture; which was read the first and second time.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE. I move that joint resolution be put upon its passage. The facts of the case are simply these: A large portion of the library of the Department of Agriculture was purchased or obtained when the department was a division in the Patent Office. The Commissioner of Patents claims this library as belonging to his department. The books mostly relate to agricultural matters. Most of them are books on agriculture. The Commissioner of Agriculture wishes to retain possession of this library, and this joint resolution merely enables him to do so. It has already been removed to the new building set apart especially for the Department of Agriculture. The resolution will do harm to nobody, and will merely enable the Department of Agriculture to retain what it is entitled to. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, and it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COAST DEFENSES.

The next business upon the Speaker's table was Senate joint resolution No. 171; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

NATIONAL CAPITAL INSURANCE COMPANY.

The next bill upon the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 642, to amend the charter of the National Capital Insurance Company; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. WELKER moved that it be referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

MRS. EMMA WILSON.

The next business upon the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 174, for the relief of Mrs.

Emma Wilson, of the State of Indiana; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. ORTH moved that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

GUSTAVUS J. CUSHMAN.

The next bill upon the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 555, to authorize the Secretary of State to adjust the claim of Gustavus J. Cushman for office rent while commissioner under the reciprocity treaty; which was read a first and second time.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of State to reopen and adjust the accounts of Gustavus J. Cushman, late commissioner of fisheries under the late reciprocity treaty with Great Britain, so far as relates to a claim for office rent upon the same basis as allowed to all his successors in the same office.

Mr. PETERS. I think no one will object to that bill. If any one objects to its passage I will make a brief explanation.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. PETERS. I think the gentleman will not insist upon that motion after a word of explanation. A similar bill has been before the Committee on Commerce and favorably acted on. There was an effort made to ingraft it upon a pending bill, and the only objection made was that it was not in accordance with the rules of the House. Mr. Cushman was the first commissioner under the treaty of 1842. He occupied an office and paid office rent, but omitted to charge it in his account. It is a small matter, of two or three hundred dollars only. The Department decided that he was entitled to it, but it was of the opinion that his accounts could not be reopened without an act of Congress. It is the same amount which has been allowed to the five different successive gentlemen who have occupied that office. I am cognizant of the facts, and I know the case has merit. Mr. Cushman is blind and poor, and is entitled to this small pittance. I hope the gentleman from Indiana will withdraw his motion to refer, and let the bill be passed.

Mr. HOLMAN. In view of the facts, with which the gentleman from Maine seems to be familiar, I withdraw the motion to refer.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PETERS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CARRIAGE OF PASSENGERS.

The next business upon the Speaker's table was Senate joint resolution No. 162; to regulate the carriage of passengers in steamships and other vessels; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. ELIOT moved that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

JOSEPH SEGAR.

The next business upon the Speaker's table was House bill No. 575, to refer the claim of Joseph Segar to the Court of Claims; which was read a first and second time.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to pay to Joseph Segar the sum of $25,000, in full satisfaction of his claim, of whatever character, for use and occupation by the United States military forces of his farm in Virginia, near Fortress Monroe, from May 24, 1861, to January 1, 1867; and also for timber cut on said farm and used by our military forces, and also for balance due him for quartermaster and subsistence supplies.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move that bill be put upon its passage.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope we are not going to charge the Court of Claims with matters of this kind. I think this matter ought to have full consideration by the Committee on the Judiciary, and I move that it be referred to that committee.

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire to make a statement to the House. The effect of this bill, as the House will see, is not to give to the Court of Claims any further power than to investigate this matter; to investigate it, of course, under the existing laws governing the proceedings of that court; to investigate it judicially; to ascertain the facts under the obligation of judicial authority, so that there can be no mistake about the facts.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I wish to ask the gentleman if we would not have to refer all claims of this kind to the Court of Claims?

Mr. BINGHAM. Not all claims. But, sir, I have this to say, the investigation being made by the court they will make a report to the House of the evidence and the facts, and the House can then pass upon it. I do not undertake to say that the claim ought to be allowed under any circumstances, and there is nothing in this bill which authorizes the Court of Claims to pronounce a decree. They are simply authorized to investigate the case; and surely the House of Representatives, with the knowledge they have of this claimant, ought not to refuse him a hearing. What I wish to say to the House is that the truth can be more certainly ascertained by this proceeding than it can be by any committee of the House.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Why make this an exception to the vast amount of similar claims? Why not refer them all at once to the Court of Claims?

Mr. BINGHAM. There is not a vast amount of similar claims.

Mr. SCOFIELD. My friend is vastly mistaken about that.

Mr. BINGHAM. I am not mistaken.

Mr. SCOFIELD. There are many similar claims that have been before his committee.

Mr. BINGHAM. Name anything of the kind.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I can name thousands. I am not speaking of claims which in all their facts are exactly like this claim of Mr. Segar, but claims of the same nature for military damages.

Mr. MAYNARD. I trust the House will give this claimant a hearing.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that it be referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. BINGHAM. If that be done the point I desire to reach is not attained at all. What I want to ascertain are the facts in the case, and to ascertain them judicially. Surely this House can afford to trust its own judgment.

Mr. SCOFIELD. If I understand it this claim comes under a resolution adopted by a previous Congress on motion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DELANO.]

Mr. BINGHAM. It is unlike other claims. The gentleman has ventured to say there are other claims like it, and I have ventured to say there are none like it. Now, I will make my statement about it. This claimant at the time the rebellion was going on occupied a seat upon this floor as a Representative of the people of Virginia. He was here in the discharge of his duty and known to those associated with him upon this floor. In the mean time his property was taken possession of by our own Army while he was attending to his public duties and unable to give attention to his affairs in Virginia. If any claim of any character whatever for damages occasioned by the destruction of property within the limits of the rebellion could be paid by the Department I have no doubt that this claim would have been investigated and decided one way or the other. But here was the owner of this property occupying a seat upon this floor, contributing by his voice and vote to the measures necessary to prosecute the war. In the mean time you took possession of his property. I want to know judicially the facts connected with this matter. Let them be ascertained under the obligations of an oath, and if it turns out that he was all the time faithful to the cause of the country, that he was in nowise participating in the rebellion, that the Government destroyed his property and derived advantage from it, then let the Court of Claims say so. The only point is whether you will allow the Court of Claims to make this investigation.

I wish further to state that by a simple reference to the Judiciary Committee, or to the Committee of Claims, you do not secure, in my judgment, that judicial investigation of the facts which will be secured in the Court of Claims. That is the difference between us.

Mr. SCOFIELD. The gentleman from Ohio says that all he wants is to ascertain the facts.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is all there is in the bill.

Mr. SCOFIELD. If you yield the floor to me I will go on.

Mr. BINGHAM. Go on.

Mr. SCOFIELD. All he wishes is to ascertain the facts so the House may act upon the case. I suppose that is all any claimant asks; that in the first instance you shall refer his claim to a committee or to the Court of Claims to ascertain the facts. I do not think any claimant will ask us to act before we have any facts; but what I state is that there are a large number of similar claims, amounting to millions of dollars, and they ought all to be treated alike. If we take one man's claim in Virginia out of the resolution adopted by a former Congress, we ought to take them all. If one is referred to the Court of Claims for investigation of the facts, let them all go there. The gentleman says this is the only claim of that nature from the State of Virginia or any State; that is, claims for damages done by our Army in the rebel States. I suppose there are thousands of such claims, involving millions of dollars.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Hundreds of millions.

Mr. SCOFIELD. The gentleman from Illinois says hundreds of millions. I am not prepared to state what the amount is, but everybody knows that the gentleman is mistaken when he says there is nobody else in Virginia or anywhere else in the insurgent States to whom our Army did injury and who are themselves loyal men. Our Army did do a large amount of injury by taking possession of lands and buildings and the destruction of crops and fences, and by taking the stock of thousands of men friendly to the Union cause; and if this man's claim is to go to the Court of Claims, why not send them all there? Is he such a special pet of this Congress that he is to be singled out of thousands whose property has been injured by the Union Army? And for what? Not to pass upon it, not to tell whether there is any merit in it, but what is the amount of the claim. Let it be referred to the Committee of Claims, of which the eloquent and accomplished gentleman from Ohio himself is chairman. He is competent to investigate it, and when he makes his report we will have as much confidence in it as if it had gone to the Court of Claims.

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask the gentleman what there is about this claim to which he objects. I infer from his statement that he does not propose to pay anybody's claim for property destroyed within the rebel States. I beg to remind the gentleman that such claims have passed this House without his protest against them. That is the first thing I have to remark.

Mr. SCOFIELD. The gentleman misrepresents my position.

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire a categorical answer to my question, whether he protests against paying any claim arising out of the appropriation of private property within the limits of the late rebellion?

Mr. SCOFIELD. If the gentleman wishes to dodge the real question—

Mr. BINGHAM. I dodge nothing.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Wait till I say a word, and do not take me off the floor. The question is not here whether all these claims shall ever be paid, but whether we shall make this a pet claim and single it out from thousands before the country just as meritorious as this. I want to treat them all alike. I will send them to his own committee, in which I have confidence, but I will not select this one and make it a special favorite, and ask the Court of Claims to give us the facts, when we are competent to investigate the facts for ourselves. I understand the reference of this to the Court of Claims means that we will give this a preference over all others.

The gentleman says that like claims passed without my protest. That is in the past, and I recall no such cases. I am talking about this one. If the gentleman has any remembrance of any let him state it, and I am prepared to reply. I recollect one case from Virginia, where a clergyman of this city came here and pleaded for it, and I believe succeeded in getting it through, but not with my vote. I think the gentleman from Ohio did vote for it, and the claim was afterward ascertained to be a fraud.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is not the only case. The gentleman has been asked to state a parallel case, and he has not done so. Here is a man engaged as a Representative of the State of Virginia on the floor of this House during the rebellion, voting for all the war measures, and in the meantime you take possession of his property, while he is not there to take charge of it himself. The gentleman says it is not an exceptional case. I say it is.

Mr. SCOFIELD. If the gentleman knows all the facts of the case why ask the Court of Claims to ascertain them for us?

Mr. BINGHAM. I know that fact, and the Journals will bear witness of it, whether the gentleman knows it or not. The gentleman undertakes to assume that the case was not exceptional. I say it is exceptional, and I challenge him to give us an instance of any sort wherein this House has refused an investigation.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman says he challenges me. It is in violation of the laws of the District to send a challenge. [Laughter.]

Mr. BINGHAM. It is in violation of the law in the gentleman's judgment, I suppose, to speak plain English here. The gentleman pretends to be in favor of an investigation. He ought to know right well that if the members of the Committee of Claims attend to the duties which devolve upon them here as Representatives of the people, they cannot be present in person elsewhere than in the Capitol in the investigation of this matter. And he knows just as well that under your existing laws the Court of Claims can issue its order of examination in any part of the country, that the examinations can be made judicially before commissioned officers of the country, and that the witnesses are liable to the pains and penalties of perjury if they testify falsely. Now, the bill that comes from the Senate simply authorizes the Court of Claims to make that investigation under the shelter of your own laws; and it is useless, utterly useless, for the gentleman from Pennsylvania or any other gentleman to undertake to say that he is in favor of investigating this matter, but that he prefers not to investigate it under the full sanctions of the law and under such provisions of the law as will enable the applicant to have a full investigation of the matter, taking care all the while of the interest of this Government.

I do not commit myself in favor of the claim at all, and the only reason I have spoken at all is, I was appealed to by this gentleman, who was associated with me on this floor as a Representative of Virginia, to ask that this House respond to the action of the Senate in giving to him a judicial hearing as to the merits of his claim before a judicial tribunal. The gentleman now seems to intimate that it is all right to investigate it, and the only question between us, therefore, is whether the most efficient way is not the best way of investigating it. That is all.

The gentleman says, why not devolve this duty upon the Court of Claims as to all other claims? I answer him by saying that the House has made an exception to its general rules already. I was not present here myself, but I understand my associates on the committee did report a claim of this kind from Georgia at the last session of this Congress, and it did pass. Whether the gentleman was as vigilant then as now I do not know, and the only reason I answer him in this spirit is, he seems to assume that there was something criminal in my asking for a fair investigation of this matter. If he did not assume that why this parade about hundreds of millions of other claims?

I say again to the House that there is something special in this case; that this petitioner was a Representative of Virginia on this floor in the midst of the rebellion, and that at the time when he was giving his voice and his vote earnestly in favor of every measure necessary to push on the war and put an end to the rebellion, this injury was done to his own property. I only ask that the facts be investigated. I think it is not asking very much to submit them to the Court of Claims. The Committee of Claims has not been in the habit of discharging this sort of duty. I understand the property is in the region of Norfolk, and I suppose the testimony ought to be taken on the spot. The authorities and the Representatives of the Government ought to be conversant with the premises involved in the dispute, and see all about the facts; and when they are ascertained, let not simply the conclusions but the testimony be reported to this House. That is what is contemplated by the bill.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to ask the gentleman whether the bill is susceptible of amendment?

Mr. BINGHAM. It may be for aught I know.

Mr. KELLEY. And whether, if so, a case strikingly analogous to this may not be included. It is the case of an engineer of the United States Navy who was away in the service of the country—the late E. A. Whipple—and while away our Army took possession of his property, cut his wood, burned his house, and finally cleared everything away, lest it should protect the enemy. The papers relating to the claim are now on my desk. It seems to me if the case of a man who was in Congress entitles it to be made an exception, then certainly the case of one who was on the sea, an engineer on one of our armed vessels, is clearly within the same scope. I therefore move to amend by inserting the name of the widow of E. A. Whipple, engineer.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I rise to a question of order. I think the question is now upon reference.

The SPEAKER. It is. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENJAMIN] moved to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] moved to amend that motion by substituting the Committee of Claims for the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BINGHAM. And my motion is to put the bill upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The motion to refer takes precedence of that.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I wish to make a single statement, in order that the House in voting upon this question may vote understandingly. This question is before the Committee of Claims, and has been before that committee for some time. It is proposed to take this matter out of the ordinary course. This bill has never been referred to a committee of this House, and the simple question for the House to decide is whether this particular bill shall take the ordinary course and be referred to a committee. We have very many bills pending before the Committee of Claims of a similar character to this bill. It is true that if you say that it is for the relief of a member of Congress who has had his property taken and appropriated by the Government, there are few cases like it, but there are many cases where there were men who went into the field and while they were fighting the battles of their country the Government took possession of their property and appropriated it, and those claims are now pending before the committee. I think we ought not to single out this bill and pass it at once without reference to a committee. If it is such a bill as has been represented it will bear investigation by any committee. Let it go to the Committee of Claims and let them report upon it. If in their judgment this case should be referred to the Court of Claims they will report it back. There is time enough. There are several cases from the State of Tennessee, as strong cases as can be made out, that have been pressed before the committee. All I ask is that we shall adopt some settled policy in regard to all these cases, and not single out a particular case.

Mr. BINGHAM. I would inquire of the gentleman whether the Committee of Claims did not report a case last session to this House and ask that it be referred to the Court of Claims for investigation?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I do not understand that they reported any case like this; but the gentleman knows very well that there are several cases pending that we laid over until this session.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman allow me to have an answer to my question? I wish to know whether we did not report to this House a claim at the last session, and ask that the Court of Claims should investigate it?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. No bill similar in any degree to this. If upon examination, in the judgment of the committee this claim ought to be referred to the Court of Claims, we can report the bill back. But what I object to is that this bill, which has been referred to no committee and has not been examined in this House, should be pressed through at the very commencement of the session. The gentleman says there are no other cases like it. He knows that there are many cases pending to-day before the Committee of Claims of men who were fighting in our Army when their property was appropriated by the Government. All I ask is that the bill shall be referred, so that the House can act upon it understandingly, and that all these cases shall be put upon the same basis. I therefore hope that the motion to refer the bill to the Committee of Claims will prevail.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN's amendment was agreed to; and Mr. BENJAMIN's motion, as amended, was then agreed to.

So the bill was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GOVERNMENTS OF VIRGINIA AND TEXAS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the joint resolution (S. R. No. 173) respecting the provisional governments of Virginia and Texas; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. BOUTWELL moved that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Reconstruction.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If the gentleman will withdraw that motion, I will move that the House now resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole, as some of my friends have expressed a desire to be heard in committee, particularly my friend from the Kennebec district of Maine, [Mr. BLAINE.]

Mr. SCOFIELD. I will withdraw my motion for that purpose.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the House now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the President's annual message. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The President's message of last year is still in Committee of the Whole, undisposed of. The message of this year is not in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Where is the message of this year?

The SPEAKER. It has been laid upon the table.

The question recurred upon the motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois; and being taken, upon a division there were—ayes seventy-six, noes not counted.

So the motion was agreed to; and accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. HOPKINS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the President's annual message of 1867.

NATIONAL AFFAIRS.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. Chairman, the three presidential elections which have resulted in victory to the Republican party are by far the most memorable and momentous in the history of our country. The issues at stake each time have been grander, the contest on either side fiercer, the verdict in each instance more decisive and significant than ever attended previous struggles for the control of the national Government. In the first victory of 1800 slavery-propagandism received its fatal blow—the American people deciding that at all hazards the further spread of human servitude into free territory should cease. This decision was resisted by a rebellious war, and the war led to the necessity of entirely abolishing the institution whose extension had been merely checked by the expression of the popular will. The election of 1804 turned upon the point of continuing or discontinuing the bloody contest, which up to that time had raged with unabated fury and with enormous sacrifice of life and property. The vote of the people demanded the prosecution of the war until the rebellion should be suppressed, the national unity secured, and slavery utterly abolished throughout the length and breadth of the land. Had the verdict then rendered been enforced in the Cabinet as faithfully as it was in the field, the Presidential struggle of 1868 would not have turned upon the issues which actually entered into it. But the unexpected and unprecedented course of the Executive, the revived malignity of the southern rebellion, and the manifold attacks on our national character and credit by the Democratic party, rendered the victory of 1808 as absolutely essential to conserve and preserve the fruits of our great triumph, as was the victory of 1804 to insure the prosecution of the war to a successful conclusion. And now that victory, complete and unsullied, has been won, and the passions naturally engendered in the heat of the canvass are gradually cooling, it may not be unprofitable to take a hasty glance at the ground we have passed over, and to make a brief summary of the points that have been solemnly adjudicated and permanently settled by the American people in the election of General Grant to the Presidency.

And first: The union of the States has been maintained, and its perpetuity guaranteed, by this election, in a sense and with a force that were never before enunciated when the question was involved. I do not mean to assert that the election of Mr. Seymour would have necessarily led to a separation of the States, though there are not wanting facts of great significance that might well justify such an inference and such a fear. But what I do mean is that the triumph of the Democratic party under its rebel lead, and the formal installing of that element in supreme executive control, would have destroyed the true aim and spirit of the Union and reduced our Government as Mr. Webster said the same pernicious theories would have reduced it in 1830, "to the worst forms of the old Confederation" in which the "lost cause" would have regained its paradise of State rights and its privilege of ruthlessly trampling on many of the most precious principles and priceless guarantees of our Constitution. General Grant's election has averted this great evil—not merely by a temporary triumph, leaving the contest to be renewed hereafter with doubtful issue in the end, but with a victory that removes it from the list of questions on which parties will divide in the future. The election of 1868 is the last in which the lately rebellious section, even if it could be wholly controlled by rebels, will have sufficient power in the electoral vote of the country to make it the object either of hope or of fear on the part of political organizations striving for the government of the nation. The tendency has been in that direction ever since Mr. Calhoun's famous theory of an equipose of free and slave States was destroyed by the admission of California in 1850. The relative power of the two sections has been changing since that date with startling rapidity, even without the intervention of war; and the approaching census of 1870 will disclose the fact that the ten rebel States, viewed as one compact power, will no longer have sufficient strength to offer temptation to the Democratic party of the North to sacrifice its loyalty and its pride for the profit of an alliance with them. The withdrawal of northern Democratic support from these States will give to the loyal inhabitants, who are a clear majority in each one of them, the power of governing them in the interest of loyalty, whereby the sectional and clannish spirit that has been their bane and their destruction will be expelled, and broad, generous, national sympathies take its place. And the effect of this result on the northern Democratic party in turn will be to enforce in the end an abandonment of the disloyal attitude by which it has lost its ancient prestige and renown. The southern rebels and the northern Democrats having derived no honor nor profit from their persistent coöperation, may find mutual advantage and gain by a separation in which each, disencumbered of the other, may atone at leisure for the joint sins of the discreditable partnership. This prospective and penitent attitude of the two great classes of offenders heralds the dawn of that day when Presidential elections will be contested and decided without a melancholy prediction or a savage menace of a dissolution of the Union. There are few voters now living in this country who ever participated in a presidential campaign in which the fate of the Union was not involved either in the angry threats of political malcontents or in the timid apprehensions of well-meaning citizens. That day has now passed. We have heard the last of that alarm in 1868. The Union was actually saved by General Grant's victories in the field. The menace of its destruction ceases with his victory at the polls.

Second: The reconstruction laws of Congress have been vindicated and sustained by General Grant's election. The State governments erected under those laws will be upheld and the basis of impartial loyal suffrage, without regard to race or color, will be accepted as the permanent rule in the lately rebellious States, as it will be at no distant day throughout the entire Union. This result is certain to be achieved either through the amelioration of prejudice and the conquering force of justice in the individual States or by the comprehensive influence of a constitutional amendment which shall affect all the States equally and alike. The decision in favor of the reconstruction measures must bring peace to the South—and with peace will come contentment and affluence. The rebellious element in those States, seeing the hopeless folly of longer resisting the mandate of the nation, will acquiesce in the decision, if with no better grace than merely accepting the inevitable. And with this acceptance will begin the real prosperity of that section, in which property will then be secure, investments inviting and remunerative, labor in demand and amply paid. The better minds even among the rebel leaders recognize and admit that as a question of practical statesmanship it is too late to discuss negro suffrage; for having been granted it is impossible to recall it. Between originally withholding a franchise from large masses of people and annulling it after it has been conceded, wise men can see a vast difference—a difference quite literally as great, it may be, as that between peaceful discussion and bloody conflict. So that even excluding from the case the abstract and unchanging element of justice which underlies it, it is demonstrably impracticable to withhold suffrage from the southern negroes now that they have exercised it, without involving consequences which would destroy all security for life or property in that section for generations to come. Negro suffrage being then of necessity conceded as one of the essentials of reconstruction, the only remaining source of discontent is the exclusion of a small minority of white men from the polls by reason of disloyalty. And here the evil lies in the disloyalty and not in the exclusion—and I know I am safe in saying that the exclusion will be removed quite as rapidly as the disloyalty disappears. And the disloyal white men of the South should be quite contented if they acquire suffrage as rapidly as the loyal colored men of the whole country. May we not hope that the patriotic conduct of the one class and the softening of unreasonable prejudice toward the other, will enable the American people to hold the centennial celebration of their independence with no citizen of the Republic disfranchised, and with the sublime declaration that "all men are created equal" accepted and realized on the hundredth anniversary of its majestic utterance.

Third: The election of General Grant has settled the financial question. I do not mean that it has adjusted the details or even foreshadowed the particular measures by which the public debt is to be provided for and its prompt payment assured. I only mean that the American people have deliberately, solemnly, and emphatically recorded their decision in favor of an honest discharge of their public obligations, and against all the forms of evasion and delusion so temptingly set forth in Democratic platforms. They have declared against the policy of wildly inflating, depreciating, and ruining their currency in order to prematurely pay off any portion of the Government bonds; and they have declared with equal emphasis in favor of lightening the public burdens by reducing the interest on the national debt as promptly and as rapidly as it may be done with honor. They have decided against all forms of repudiation "open or covert, threatened or suspected," and in favor of upholding the public faith and maintaining the public honor spotless and stainless. Nay, they have gone one step further; the question of paying the public debt "in the utmost good faith, according to the letter and the spirit of the contract" is no longer to be made the subject of controversy or of doubt in the American Congress. Henceforth we may do well to remember that proud example furnished us in the parliamentary history of Great Britain, where just preceding the eventful battle of Blenheim, the probability of Marlborough's defeat being angrily suggested by one of the Commons, he was answered by the most brilliant man of that day in these eloquent and ever memorable words:

"The question of England's ability to maintain her position should not be discussed in her own Parliament. Discussion implies doubt, and doubt breeds disaster. Our business is to provide the means for the national defense, and let us to our task."

Fourth: With the election of General Grant comes a higher standard of American citizenship—with more dignity and character to the name abroad and more assured liberty and security attaching to it at home. Our diplomacy will be rescued from the subservient tone by which we have so often been humiliated in our own eyes and in the eyes of Europe, and the true position of the first nation of the earth in rank and prestige will be asserted; not in the spirit of bravado or with the mere arrogance of strength, but with the conscious dignity which belongs to power, and with the moderation which is the true ornament of justice. And with this vindication of the rights and the rank of our citizenship abroad will come also its protection and its panoply at home. That provision of the Federal Constitution which solemnly guarantees that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States" will not be a dead letter under the administration of General Grant as it in fact has been from the foundation of the Federal Government down to this hour. Henceforward it is to be practically enforced throughout all our borders, and every citizen of the Republic, himself observant of the law and of the rights of others, shall go where it may please him, and speak as he may see fit, unawed by mobs, unharmed by murders, unmenaced in life, limb or estate!

With these four cardinal points settled by the people, General Grant's administration will have high vantage ground from the day of its inauguration. Its responsibilities will indeed be great, its power will be large, its opportunities will be splendid; and to meet them all we have a true and tried man; who adds to his other great elements of strength that of perfect trust and confidence on the part of the people. And to reassure ourselves of his executive character, if reassurance were necessary, let us remember that great military leaders have uniformly proved the wisest, firmest, and best of civil rulers. Cromwell, William III, Charles XII, Frederic of Prussia, are not more conspicuous instances in monarchical Governments than Washington, Jackson, and Taylor have proved in our own. Whatever, therefore, may lie before us in the untrodden and often beclouded path of the future—whether it be financial embarrassment, or domestic trouble of another and more serious type, or misunderstandings with foreign nations, or the extension of our flag and our sovereignty over insular or continental possessions, North or South, that fate or fortune may peacefully offer to our ambition—let us believe with all confidence that General Grant's administration will meet every exigency with the courage, the ability, and the conscience which American nationality and Christian civilization demand.

Mr. WINDOM obtained the floor, but yielded to

Mr. KOONTZ, who moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HARKINS reported that the Committee of the Whole, pursuant to order, had had under consideration the Union generally, and particularly the President's annual message of 1867, and had come to no resolution thereon.

DISTILLED SPIRITS AND TOBACCO.

Mr. COBURN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1493) to amend section seventy-eight of an act entitled "An act imposing taxes on distilled spirits and tobacco, and for other purposes," approved July 20, 1868; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JUDICIAL DISTRICT, VIRGINIA.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1494) creating an additional judicial district in Virginia; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL CURRENCY.

Mr. INGERSOLL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1495) supplemental to an act entitled "An act to provide a national currency, secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved June 3, 1864, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

VENTILATION OF THE HALL.

Mr. JULIAN. I ask unanimous consent to submit, for consideration at this time, the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas a new improvement in the method of ventilating public buildings has been invented, known as Root's rotary blower, which in sundry instances has proved a success on trial: Therefore,

Resolved, That the select Committee on Ventilation of this Hall be instructed to inquire into the character and utility of said improvement, and the practicability of applying the same in the ventilation of this Hall, and that they report to this House by bill or otherwise.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I object to any action on that subject; let the resolution be referred to a committee.

Mr. JULIAN. Very well; I move that it be referred to the select Committee on Ventilation.

The motion to refer was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL POST ROUTES.

Mr. KERR, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1496) to establish certain post routes; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

MEDICAL DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY.

Mr. STEWART, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1497) to reorganize and increase the efficiency of the medical department of the Navy; which was read a first and second time, and, with accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the various votes of reference; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. ELDRIDGE moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. FERRY. I ask the Senator from Nevada, in reference to that bill, to let it lie on the table for the present, as upon the motion to refer it I desire to submit some remarks on a measure introduced by me last week. If the Senator from Nevada will let this bill lie on the table I will call it up to-morrow, with the consent of the Senate, and at the same time submit some brief remarks on the bill I introduced the other day.

Mr. STEWART. I have no objection to that course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will lie on the table for the present.

Mr. MORTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 678) to provide for the redemption in coin of the United States notes and fractional currency, and requiring the national banks to redeem their notes in specie; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. MORTON. I move that the bill be printed and laid on the table. I will say to the Senate that I should like to call it up on Wednesday morning for the purpose of making some remarks upon it.

The motion was agreed to.

UNITED STATES BONDS.

Mr. DAVIS. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury inform the Senate what was the aggregate amount of each issue of United States bonds by their respective dates, and the aggregate amount of the gold value of each issue of said bonds at their dates, and also the rate of interest borne by them respectively.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is not a particle of that information which is not already published in the documents, and to answer the inquiry would require the employment of a large number of clerks for a great length of time to compute all these various sums. Now, I ask the Senate why incur the expense of such an order when the information is on the files of both Houses of Congress and published in our reports? I object to the passage of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution can only be considered at this time by unanimous consent. Is there any objection to its consideration?

Mr. SHERMAN. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then it will go over under the rule.

DISTURBANCE IN LOUISIANA.

Mr. KELLOGG. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That Major General O. O. Howard, Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau, be requested to transmit to the Senate any information in his possession from any officers connected with the Freedmen's Bureau in the State of Louisiana touching the recent disturbance in said State.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I would suggest to my friend from Louisiana that it is not the practice of the Senate to call upon subordinate officers in the Departments for information. Whenever any information is to be obtained in the War Department the usual practice of the Senate has been to pass a resolution directing the Secretary of War to furnish it, and he calls upon the proper subordinate officer, but it comes to us through the Secretary.

Mr. KELLOGG. I will modify the resolution by substituting the Secretary of War instead of the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau.

The resolution was modified to read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to transmit to the Senate any information in his possession from the officers connected with the Freedmen's Bureau in the State of Louisiana touching the recent disturbance in said State.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

TROOPS ON THE PLAINS.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to the Senate the number of United States troops employed on the plains or frontiers in connection with Indian hostilities, in protecting the Missouri river traffic, the Union Pacific railroad, or in otherwise policing that region of country; and also, whether volunteer forces or militia from the States or Territories or Indians are or have been so employed; and if so, what numbers, from what States or Territories, and upon what authority, and upon whose order.

WASHITA RIVER BATTLE.

Mr. HENDERSON submitted the following resolutions; which were considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to communicate to the Senate all reports, papers, and other information in the Department connected with the late battle of the Washita river.

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to communicate to the Senate all reports, papers, or other information in the Department connected with the late Indian battle on the Washita river.

COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Revising the Rules of the Senate be instructed to inquire and report as to the expediency of authorizing a committee of five on education.

By unanimous consent the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, I know the reluctance of the Senate to establish new standing committees; but it appears to me that this is a subject of sufficient importance to demand at least that amount of consideration on our part. Other nations having less popular institutions than our own are certainly bestowing more attention to this subject than we are at the present time. It would seem to be the will of Congress to abolish the Bureau of Education, and after that the least we can do, in my opinion, is to have a standing committee upon the subject. Under the law establishing agricultural colleges, so called, it appears that the several States have established them on very different principles. Some of them are quite successful. Others, perhaps, have not been long enough established to enable us to determine whether they will be successful or not. There are applications on the part of the States which have recently resumed their practical relations with the Government for the extension of the act establishing those colleges. Under these circumstances, it seems to me that a committee of the kind indicated would be calculated to promote the efficiency of these colleges. While the general subject of education is well placed under the control of the States, it would certainly seem proper that the Government of the United States should place itself in active sympathy with universal education. I therefore hope the Senate will concur with me as to the propriety of having this new committee established.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I sympathize entirely with what the Senator from Vermont has said in regard to education; but I do not understand that we have in the Senate any Committee on Rules.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I propose to have one on education.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposition is to raise such a committee.

Mr. TRUMBULL. A committee on rules?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. No. The resolution merely proposes to refer the subject to the Committee on Rules, to report on the propriety of having such a committee.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is the way I understood the Senator before. What I meant to say was, that there is no committee on rules to which to refer his resolution. The Senator moves to refer his resolution to the committee on rules. The Senate has no such committee.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I understand we have such a committee on the revision of the rules of the Senate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It expired with the session.

Mr. SUMNER. I suggest to my friend from Vermont that the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Library. I agree with him entirely. I think we ought to do something on that subject.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Committee on the Revision of the Rules was a special committee, which exhausted itself at the end of the session.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I move, then, to substitute the Committee on Agriculture.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That modification will be made if there be no objection. The resolution, as amended, was adopted.

PRESIDENTIAL MESSAGE.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. WILLIAM G. MOORE, his Secretary, announced that the President had on the 10th instant approved and signed the bill (S. No. 658) to relieve from disabilities Franklin J. Moses, a citizen of South Carolina.

Several executive messages were also received from the President of the United States.

CONSIDERATION OF INDIAN TREATIES.

Mr. DRAKE. I move that the Senate take up for consideration the resolution which I offered last July, requiring Indian treaties to be considered in open Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, That Rule 38 be amended by adding thereto the following: "Treaties with Indian tribes or parts of tribes shall be considered and passed upon in open session."

Mr. DRAKE. When that resolution was before the Senate last week it was laid over at the suggestion of some gentlemen because the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs was not then in the Senate. He is now in his seat, and in conversation with him I learn that he has no objection to the passage of the resolution. I hope, sir, that it will be passed now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Missouri what distinction there is between this class of treaties and others which should make it necessary to consider these in open session and others in executive session? There may be a good reason; I dare say there is in the mind of my friend. I ask for information.

Mr. DRAKE. I confess, Mr. President, that I am rather surprised that a gentleman who sees as far into things generally as my friend from Vermont should ask me the reason. Treaties with foreign nations involve a great many questions, and arise in a great many different circumstances where it is important oftentimes that the terms of them should not transpire and that the deliberations upon them should be in secret. But there is nothing of that kind in any treaty that we ever have with any Indian tribe until there comes in some land stealing operation, and then it is very desirable that there should be secrecy in the consideration of the treaty. Except in that case I know of no circumstances whatever in which our relations to the Indian tribes can be affected by the publicity of treaties which are made between the contracting powers publicly in the field and come here for ratification. I do not see any reason why any opportunity should be given whatever for passing through in secret session treaties with Indians containing provisions which it would not be desirable that the country should know all about and hear all that is said about them. My main object, I confess, is to put a stop by this proceeding to such iniquitous land transactions as have disgraced some of our Indian treaties.

Mr. POMEROY. I have no objection to considering this class of treaties and all treaties in open session. I know furthermore that if we undertake to consider anything in secret session it is a very sure way of having it well ventilated and well published. I have never known a treaty yet that was not as well understood outside of the Senate as in, even those upon which we have gone through the ceremony, or sometimes perhaps the farce, of considering in secret session. But we are now at war with some Indian tribes, and if that war is ever to terminate it will terminate by the adoption of a treaty, and it may not be best to consider such a treaty as that in open Senate, because the very ratification of the treaty may close the war or it may prolong the war. If there is any reason why a treaty with a foreign nation should be considered in secret session that same reason applies equally to treaties with the Indian tribes that are now hostile to this Government, and are foreign nations according to the way we are treating them, and if the war with them is to terminate it is to terminate upon some settlement by treaty.

The other day the only objection I made was—I do not know but that I was the Senator to whom the gentleman referred—that there were one or two other rules that would require to be amended if this one was amended, and I suggested that the resolution should be referred to a committee so as to make the rules harmonious and have them all amended. I should not have said a word on this subject if it had been reported upon by any committee. I do not care what committee considers it, but our rules ought not to be in conflict with each other. We tried during the last session to make a harmonious system, and I supposed we had succeeded; and I now merely say that if this proposition shall be reported by any committee, with an amendment to one or two other rules harmonizing them, I shall vote for it.

Mr. DRAKE. Will the honorable Senator from Kansas be so kind as to state what other rules this will come in conflict with?

Mr. POMEROY. I have not the rules before me, but the Senator is aware that we have two or three rules referring to proceedings in secret session.

Mr. DRAKE. But this will take the whole subject of Indian treaties out of secret session, and therefore it cannot conflict with any rule in relation to proceedings in secret session.

Mr. POMEROY. We have one rule which says that treaties shall be considered in secret session.

Mr. DRAKE. That is the very rule I propose to amend, by making this addition to it taking these treaties out of the operation of that rule.

Mr. POMEROY. I should like to have some committee read the rules in connection with this proposed new rule, and see what amendments are required to be made. That rule will certainly have to be changed.

Mr. DRAKE. That is the very proposition I make, to change it.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Where a treaty or other paper is sent to the Senate by the President as confidential it is under our rules considered as of course in executive session. If this resolution is to be adopted I should like to have inserted in it an exception, excepting such treaties as are sent here by the President as confidential. He may have occasion to mark a treaty in that manner, and have good reason for doing so, as in the case supposed by the Senator from Kansas. Suppose another case, as unfortunately was the case in the war with Mexico, that we were about negotiating a treaty with some Indian tribes on the borders, and did not desire the enemy to know the proceedings. In very many cases it might be entirely proper that the President should send to us a treaty as a confidential paper, and that we should consider it as such under our existing rules. I have no objection to the resolution of the Senator from Missouri as a general rule hereafter that Indian treaties shall be considered in open session, but where the Executive, who negotiates them, thinks the proceedings should be kept secret, I think we should retain our existing rule.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I am decidedly in favor of this resolution. It seems to me there is nothing so unnecessary as closing the doors and making the room uncomfortable while we are considering an Indian treaty. Besides, it is almost impossible when these treaties are considered to get a quorum of a Senate or a sufficient number to consider it to stay, particularly when we have the summer session. All are aware that most of the Senators leave, on account of the oppressive heat, after the doors are closed. These treaties are very long; we do not even hear them read; and if this treaty business with the Indians is to be continued the treaties certainly ought to be considered in open session. As for myself I do not believe much in Indian treaties. I do not believe that there are any nations or tribes of Indians of sufficient importance, sufficient independence of character, and sufficient amount of government and order among themselves now existing in the western country to entitle them to be treated with. They are very differently situated from what they were at the foundation of our Government. The eastern tribes are better organized and they have more responsible heads; but the majority of the Indians now are wandering bands, particularly in the wild country, except a few Cherokees and Choctaws and those of the Indian territory. The majority of the Indians with whom we make treaties and are to make them are wandering tribes, and undoubtedly in open session facts would come out frequently showing that the parties with whom you were dealing were after all quite irresponsible. At all events, it seems to me that good might result from this publicity; further information might be obtained, and no harm could possibly arise. Our negotiations with a few Indians cannot be of such a delicate character under any circumstances as to require secrecy. I think secrecy is very detrimental in many cases where we now have it. I am decidedly in favor of this resolution, and think it will be a great improvement.

Mr. POMEROY. The resolution of the Senator from Missouri proposes to amend the thirty eighth rule. I will read the thirty-ninth rule, which his resolution does not propose to amend, in order to show that the one will be in direct conflict with the other. The thirty-ninth rule is as follows:

"39. All confidential communications made by the President of the United States to the Senate shall be by the Senators and the officers of the Senate kept secret; and all treaties which may be laid before the Senate, and all remarks and proceedings thereon, shall also be kept secret."

Would not this rule have to be changed? Then, the fortieth rule would also have to be changed. If any committee will report a change of the rules so as to make them in harmony I will vote for this proposition. I do not care anything about considering Indian treaties in open session. I have no objection to that; but I do insist that if one rule is changed they shall all be changed, so as to be made harmonious.

Mr. DRAKE. If it is the will of the Senate to adopt this proposition I will prepare other amendments to obviate the objection now made by the Senator from Kansas. I was not aware that the adoption of this resolution would require the least change in any other rule; but if I should find it to be so, after this is adopted I will immediately address myself to the work of preparing the necessary modifications to meet this change.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have no objection to the amendment contemplated by my colleague. I rise merely to make one remark in behalf of the present Indian Committee. I desire to say that so far as they are concerned every treaty that has come before us has had proper consideration, and that since I have been connected with that committee no treaties of the character alluded to by my colleague—land-stealing treaties—have ever passed that committee, or passed this body. I have nothing to say with regard to treaties previous to the time I had connection with the Indian Committee; but since I have had connection with it I can assure him and other Senators that every treaty that has come there has been carefully scrutinized, and that no treaty of an exceptionable character has passed that committee or passed this body.

Mr. DRAKE. Mr. President, I desire promptly and distinctly to say that in the motion which I made I had not the slightest intention of making any reference to the present Committee on Indian Affairs, or to the chairman of that committee, that would involve any implication unfavorable to them in that connection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think the Senator from Kansas is right in suggesting that this resolution ought to go to a committee in order that if it be adopted, as very likely it may be—I certainly have no objection to it—the analogous and related rules may be so verbally changed as to make them all stand in harmony. It will not occasion any delay. I move, therefore, that this resolution be referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, which is the most appropriate standing committee that we have to revise this subject.

Mr. POMEROY. I desire merely to say that I shall vote with my friend from Missouri for this proposition so soon as it can be made harmonious with the other rules, but not before. I think it should be referred to a committee.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I move to amend the resolution by inserting at the end these words: "except where the same shall be transmitted as confidential by the President."

Mr. EDMUNDS. The motion to refer is first in order.

Mr. DRAKE. I have no objection to the reference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on referring the resolution to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws.

Mr. CONKLING. I rise not to make objection to the proposed reference, but to suggest that any committee to which it is referred ought to act in the light of some expression from the Senate on the main question. The proper mission of a committee is to adapt this resolution to the rules as they stand, or else to adapt other rules to this. That is all, I take it, that is needed of any committee. That, it will be perceived, does not go at all to the main question, whether it be the judgment and pleasure of the Senate that these treaties shall hereafter be considered as open legislation is, or whether they shall remain, as now, part of the executive and confidential matter of the Senate. Therefore, I suggest to the honorable Senator from Vermont that if he will accompany his motion to refer with some instruction, one way or the other, which will enable the Senate to express its judgment upon this question, it will expedite the conclusion of the matter, and I should be very glad that it might be so.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should not wish to instruct the Committee on the Revision of the Laws any more than any other committee of this body. We always refer projects that the movers of them certainly expect to have carried to committees without any preliminary expression of the direction we expect the proceeding to take. It is impracticable in a body that has committees, as a rule, to undertake to decide beforehand what a committee is to do; and after what has been said in debate here, I am sure the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, which brings fresh talent to the labors of legislation—as I believe this is the first subject that has yet been referred to it—will be enabled to reflect the opinion of the Senate by reporting upon this resolution, after what has been said, favorably; or whether they are in favor of it or not, they can report it with such suggestions of amendment, if it is to be adopted, as will make it perfectly satisfactory to everybody; and so I hope it will be referred without any further occupation of time.

Mr. CONKLING. The response of the honorable Senator from Vermont is so entirely satisfactory, and so clearly instructive and to the point I suggested, that it is very unreasonable in me, no doubt, not to be entirely satisfied; but, notwithstanding the copious instruction and satisfaction which he affords, I venture to press for one moment this suggestion: everybody will see that it is no part of the Senator's purpose in referring this proposition to a committee to obtain from the committee its judgment upon the propriety of reaching a given end, but only to have the committee devise a mode by which this object can be properly and systematically attained. If the Senator is serious in wishing to refer this proposition to the committee he names, or any other committee, for the purpose of obtaining the judgment of that committee upon a question which I submit is quite transparent as it stands, because it presents a single point which has long been the subject of reflection here—if, nevertheless, he is serious in saying he wants the judgment of a committee on that question, of course I should not like to be understood as interposing any objection; but in point of fact we all know that that is not the purpose. The purpose is to adapt these rules to each other, if the rule itself which is now proposed is to be adopted. Therefore, I move as an amendment to the motion to refer that the committee be instructed to report the resolution back with such amendments to the resolution or to the standing rules as will enable the Senate properly to consider these treaties in public.

Mr. GRIMES. During the time that I have been here, and, as I have been told frequently by those who were much longer in the Senate when I came here, from the foundations of the Government to this time, a resolution has never been passed instructing one of the committees of this body. The object of a reference to a committee is to enable them to consider the subject and report their judgment, and their judgment alone, and the Senate is presumed to act upon it. I apprehend this reference to the committee is not alone to adopt such verbal phraseology as may be made necessary by this proposed change, but to come to what is a just conclusion in their judgment as to what we should do in the future, to establish what should be the future practice. I trust, therefore, that we shall not pass any resolutions of instruction, but refer the whole subject to the committee and let them report whether or not they think it advisable for us to change our rules—a question about which there are very strong arguments on both sides.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on referring the resolution to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws with certain instructions.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I call for a division of the question. Let us vote on the instructions separately.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The instructions will have to be voted on separately, as I do not accept them as an amendment to my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first question will be on instructing the committee.

The motion was not agreed to—ayes four, noes not counted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion to refer the resolution to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws.

Mr. DRAKE. I have just had placed in my hands for the first time, so as to examine them, the rules which bear upon matters in secret session, and I must be permitted to say that I do not see any reason in the world for referring this matter to a committee in order to reconcile the different rules with each other. There is not in the rules thirty-ninth or fortieth anything which will be brought in conflict with the thirty-eighth rule, if amended as I propose. They refer merely to proceedings in secret session; but when you take the Indian treaties out of the secret session and bring them into open session there is, of course, no application in the thirty-ninth and fortieth rules to them. I do not see any reason, when I come to look into the rules, for the reference, and I hope it will not be made.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to ask my friend from Missouri whether he intends in open session that these treaties shall be carried by a mere majority, or whether he intends the rules that now apply to the adoption and ratification of treaties in secret session to have force in open session as to the method of procedure and the number requisite to adjust the treaties. If, as I suppose he does, he intends to have the procedure upon an Indian treaty conducted in the same manner that it would be in secret session, save that the doors are open, then I submit to him that it is open to some question whether on that point, upon the very argument he makes, there should not be such a change as to make the rules for the secret session applicable to procedure in open session. It may be that they are now, but a committee ought to consider whether any change in that respect should be made.

Mr. DRAKE. If I am not mistaken, the matter of what shall constitute a ratification of a treaty is fixed by the Constitution, not by the rules of the Senate, and whether the treaty is considered in open or secret session that rule of the Constitution is to be operative in the case, and no rule which the Senate could make of a different kind would have any other effect.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That assumes that they are foreign nations.

Mr. DRAKE. And the Government has always assumed that these Indian tribes were foreign nations to us, and has treated with them on that basis, and the Constitution prescribes what shall amount to a ratification here in the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It does not prescribe how the question shall be put, does it?

Mr. DRAKE. It does not matter; the question can be put in any way, in open session or secret session.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I would not want a vote upon the merits of this question just now. I think it is usual to refer propositions to change the rules to a committee. I do not see why this should be made an exception. I cannot conceive that the proposition of the Senator from Missouri is so entirely clear as that it ought to be decided without the aid of a committee's investigation at all, and I do not see why he is not willing that it shall take the usual course. Let us know what is the judgment of the committee on this proposition. I do not know myself what would be right about it. My inclination is that a good deal of the business that is transacted in secret session might more properly be transacted in public session, but I would not want to act upon that until a committee had reported upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion to refer.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills and joint resolutions from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

A bill (H. R. No. 1490) to define the pay of officers of the Army detailed as military instructors;

A bill (H. R. No. 1487) to declare and fix the status of the corps of judge advocates of the Army;

A bill (H. R. No. 1488) to consolidate the several asylums for aged and disabled soldiers created under the laws of the United States;

A bill (H. R. No. 1489) granting a portion of the military reservation at Sault Ste. Marie, Michigan, to the American Baptist Home Mission Society;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 373) directing the Secretary of War to sell Bergen Heights arsenal;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 374) authorizing the sale of the Chattanooga rolling-mill property at Chattanooga, Tennessee, to the Southwestern Iron Company;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 375) donating condemned cannon for the erection of a monument to Major General Kearny; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 376) to pay W. S. Morse and Charles S. Shambaugh for services rendered the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives.

ADJOURNMENT FOR THE HOLIDAYS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That when the two Houses of Congress adjourn on Monday, the 21st instant, they adjourn to meet on Tuesday, the 5th of January, 1869.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of that resolution.

Mr. SUMNER. I think it had better lie over.

Mr. HENDRICKS. There is no necessity for its lying over. It may as well be acted upon now. It is a matter of personal convenience to know in advance what course is to be pursued. The House of Representatives of course expected that the question would be settled at once. It is due to the House that we should give it consideration at an early hour. I move that the resolution be taken up now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SUMNER. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It goes over, under the rule.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I did not know that the rule applied to a case like this. It is a concurrent resolution that has come from the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It came over this morning, and objection being made to its consideration it goes over under the rules.

THE CALENDAR.

Mr. TRUMBULL. With a view of relieving the Calendar from the mass of unimportant measures upon it, I renew the motion that I made the other day that the Secretary take the Calendar and read the business upon it in its order with a view to striking off such of it as there is no objection to striking off. That will facilitate our business very much.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois, that the Secretary proceed to read the Calendar for the purpose of striking from it impertinent and irrelevant matter.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will suggest, by leave of the Senate, that if the chairmen of the various committees of the Senate would take the Calendar in their hands they will see that there is upon it a great deal of business which will not hereafter require the attention of the Senate—resolutions and bills the object of which or the reasons for introducing which have now transpired, and they may as well be stricken from the Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will proceed to read the Calendar according to the motion of the Senator from Illinois.

The CHIEF CLERK. The first resolution on the Calendar is a resolution of the House of Representatives for the appointment of a joint committee to inquire into and report what further legislation, if any, is needed in reference to the Capitol police force—received from the House July 5, 1867.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that it be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. SUMNER. Why should not that be referred to a committee? It has never been.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is a year and a half ago since it was presented, and the object of it has been accomplished, I suppose; but if the Senator from Massachusetts desires its reference I have no objection.

Mr. SUMNER. No; I know nothing about it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Certainly, having received no attention since July 5, 1867, it is not at all likely that it is important.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois, to postpone the resolution indefinitely.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senate will consent to that course, the Chair will deem that when anything is read it may be considered as indefinitely postponed, unless that course is objected to. If such be the pleasure of the Senate, such will be the disposition of matters reached in their order. The next item will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. "A resolution of the House of Representatives in relation to the adoption of the phonetic system of spelling in general use in schools and general literature—received from the House of Representatives July 18, 1867."

Mr. SUMNER. I think that had better be referred to the Committee on the Library; and I make that motion.

Mr. CONNESS. I think there is such a resolution which has been referred to that committee, but from whom no report has been had, if I am not mistaken. I would ask the chairman of the committee if that is not the case.

Mr. MORGAN. The committee were discharged from the consideration of the resolution referred to at the last session.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That being so, this had better be disposed of.

Mr. CONNESS. I should like to have this resolution referred to a committee who would consider it, because there is something in the system. I believe the committee made no report except simply to be discharged, as stated by the chairman. I wish the subject could be examined. The House of Representatives has seen fit to pass a resolution in regard to it, and I think it deserves attention. There are a great many very able persons in the United States who believe that a change in this regard would be very beneficial, and that the change should be initiated and tried at least, which could be done without, perhaps, any cost to the public Treasury.

Mr. SUMNER. I understand the Senator from New York [Mr. MORGAN] makes no objection to the reference to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. CONNESS. Let it be referred, then, and I hope the committee will examine the subject.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope it will be referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is to refer the resolution to the Committee on the Library.

The motion was agreed to.

The next resolution on the Calendar was a resolution by Mr. SUMNER, declaring certain guarantees required in the reconstruction of the rebel States, submitted March 7, 1867.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope that will not be postponed.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There are various propositions on that subject.

Mr. CONNESS. There are a great many bills on that subject; one, I think, by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, now sent to the Judiciary Committee. Why not commit this? Let them have the entire subject. The object is to get rid of matters from the Calendar that cannot be considered, perhaps, in the form in which they now are. The time which has elapsed between the introduction of these resolutions and the present period has doubtless thrown additional light on the subject. I hope it will go to the committee, if the Senator from Massachusetts has no objection, that the whole subject may be considered. I make that motion.

Mr. SUMNER. I understand that the rule under which we are now acting is that these several matters shall be acted on by unanimous consent. If there is an objection—

Mr. CONNESS. I do not so understand it.

Mr. SUMNER. There was a rule established the other day on which we are now acting. We are reading these items over, and if the indefinite postponement of any one of these propositions is objected to then we pass to the next one.

Mr. CONNESS. It is not an indefinite postponement, I would remind the Senator, but a motion to refer for consideration. I should like to know whether the Senator objects to it? If he does I will not press it.

Mr. SUMNER. I would rather this proposition should stay where it is; but if the Senator has considered it carefully, and would prefer to have it referred to a committee, I shall submit to his judgment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the motion to refer insisted upon?

Mr. CONNESS. I think the resolution had better be referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from California to refer the resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

The next resolution was a resolution of Mr. BUCKALEW, to direct a contract to be made with Richard Sutton to furnish a condensed or synoptical report of the proceedings and debates of the Senate, submitted March 30, 1867.

The resolution was indefinitely postponed.

The next resolution on the Calendar was a resolution by Mr. SUMNER, for the expulsion of Mr. SAULSBURY, Senator from Delaware.

The resolution was indefinitely postponed.

The next resolution on the Calendar was a resolution by Mr. SUMNER, proposing certain conditions to the exercise of the pardoning power, with a view of hastening the reconstruction of the rebel States, submitted July 3, 1867.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be postponed indefinitely.

Mr. SUMNER. Before that is postponed I wish to have it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Let it be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the reconstruction of the rebel States would be hastened and the best interest of the country promoted if the President of the United States, in the exercise of the pardoning power, would require that every landed proprietor who has been engaged in the rebellion, before receiving his pardon therefor, should convey to the freedmen, his former slaves, a certain portion of the land on which they have worked, so that they may have a homestead in which their own labor has mingled, and that the disloyal master may not continue to appropriate to himself the fruits of their toil.

Mr. SUMNER. Now, I ask the reference of that resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so referred if there be no objection.

The next resolution on the Calendar was the resolution, by Mr. FOWLER, in relation to the enforcement of the first clause of section four, article four, of the Constitution, guarantying a republican form of government to the several States, submitted July 12, 1867.

Mr. GRIMES. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is manifest that we are making very little progress by these references. My object was to dispose of matter that there was now no necessity for legislation upon. Now, the Senator from Massachusetts has just had referred a resolution in regard to the conditions upon which pardons should be granted. The Senator from Massachusetts knows very well that so far as the Executive has the power to pardon it has been exercised pretty freely, and there would be very little land produced by inserting any such condition. But, sir, I did not rise to discuss these matters. The idea was that resolutions, the object for introducing which had transpired, had better be postponed indefinitely and not brought back. If they are referred to a committee they will be brought back and go on the Calendar again.

Mr. CONNESS. It seems to me that the disposition which is being made of the majority of these resolutions only exhibits the confidence of the Senate in the honorable chairman and his committee, and that he ought to be rather pleased with them. I hope we shall refer everything that is valuable to them, so that they may have the opportunity to consider the matter.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SHERMAN. Unless some Senator desires to submit a proposition for the action of the Senate I will move an adjournment. I think we are wasting time. We can render better service in the committees. I move, therefore, that the Senate adjourn. There is no object in going through the Calendar in this way.

Mr. CONNESS. I have some business that I should like to call up.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well; then I withdraw the motion. I understand there is executive business to be attended to, and I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. After an executive session we can resume legislative business if it is desired.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After a short executive session the doors were reopened.

NATIONAL DEBT.

Mr. CATTELL. I ask the consent of the Senate to offer a resolution at this time. I send it to the desk to be read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate receive with profound regret the proposition of the President in his annual message to repudiate a portion of the national obligations, and regard this and all forms of repudiation as a national crime. National honor requires the payment of the public debt in the utmost good faith to all creditors at home and abroad, not only according to the letter, but the spirit of the laws under which it was created.

Mr. CATTELL. Mr. President, it seems to me that the extraordinary proposition contained in the President's annual message, favoring the repudiation of the public debt, should not go to the country without a prompt and decided expression by the Senate of their unqualified disapprobation. And it is with this view I offer the resolution just read.

Let the full scope and meaning of this passage in the message may have escaped the attention of some Senators, I beg to read it again in your hearing:

"It may be assumed that the holders of our securities have already received upon their bonds a larger amount than their original investment, measured by a gold standard. Upon this statement of facts it would seem but just and equitable that the six per cent. interest now paid by the Government should be applied to the reduction of the principal in semi-annual installments, which in sixteen years and eight months would liquidate the entire national debt. Six per cent. in gold would at present rates be equal to nine per cent. in currency, and equivalent to the payment of the debt one and a half times in a fraction less than seventeen years. This, in connection with all the other advantages derived from their investment, would afford to the public creditors a fair and liberal compensation for the use of their capital, and with this they should be satisfied. The lessons of the past admonish the lender that it is not well to be over anxious in exacting from the borrower rigid compliance with the letter of the bond."

Mr. President, here is a simple, plain proposition emanating from the President of the United States in his message to Congress, and advocated as just and equitable, to pay to the public creditor simply the interest provided for by law and stipulated in the bond for a given number of years, and at the expiration of that period to repudiate the entire principal of the debt. It passes belief that a proposition so monstrous as this, so disgraceful, in my opinion, to the nation, so damaging to its credit at home and abroad, should emanate from the Chief Executive of this Government, whose duty it is to guard the honor and faith of the nation rather than to tarnish the one and to break the other. No man in the United States, so far as my knowledge extends, has been found hitherto bold enough to advocate open, undisguised, and unqualified repudiation. So indefensible a proposition as this has been reserved for Andrew Johnson, as a fitting climax to the wickedness and folly of his administration.

Mr. President, the people of the United States will repudiate the repudiator. In point of fact, they have already done so. At the recent elections the people of the United States invested with all the executive and legislative power of this nation the party which had the manliness to declare against all forms of repudiation as a crime, and to assert that the obligations of the national Government should be paid in good faith to the uttermost farthing. And, Mr. President, the people of the United States will stand by their verdict. The debt is a burdensome one, unquestionably; but it will be paid; it will be paid manfully and honestly; nay more, sir, it will be paid cheerfully, remembering that it is the final installment of the price paid for the preservation of the glorious institutions under which we live as a priceless inheritance for our children and our children's children. I move, sir, that this resolution be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FESSENDEN and others. Let us pass it now.

Mr. CATTELL. I have not the slightest objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on referring the resolution to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CATTELL. There seems to be a disposition to act on it now, and therefore I withdraw the motion to refer.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am entirely in favor of the resolution, except that I should wish it to state a little more specifically, so that there should not be any double construction put upon it, what it means. That resolution is in the substantial, and for aught I know in the literal, language of the Chicago platform; and there are certain good men in the country claiming to be Republicans, claiming to be in favor of national honesty, and probably being so, who have maintained that the letter and the spirit of the obligation merely require us to pay in something else, and not in money. There are a good many such people who maintain that proposition. Therefore, in the face of such a message as we have received, to merely reassert an equivocal proposition would amount to nothing at all. Let us, then, send the resolution to the Committee on Finance, who may report it to-morrow, as I hope, in such language that it will mean, beyond equivocation or misconception, that we intend to pay the public funded debt of the United States in real money, in coin, or that we do not—one or the other. Let us get rid of the equivocal which certain adroit persons maintain is found in the Chicago platform. To me there is no equivocation in that platform; but a man who really believes, as some men say they do, that the letter and spirit of our obligation are satisfied by paying only in what is called lawful money, in greenbacks, can vote for that resolution and stand just where he did before and leave the question open, just as it was before. If we are to say anything, as I am satisfied our duty requires us to say something, let us say that which is absolutely unequivocal.

Mr. WILSON. I ask to have the resolution read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate receive with profound regret the proposition of the President in his annual message, to repudiate a portion of the national obligations, and regard this and all forms of repudiation as a national crime. National honor requires the payment of the public debt in the utmost good faith, to all creditors at home and abroad, not only according to the letter but the spirit of the laws under which it was created.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, when a resolution shall be passed on this subject, in my opinion it ought to have legislative form; that is to say, it should be the expression of opinion of the entire legislative body, both Houses included. This is a resolution of the Senate simply. While I am in favor of any resolution upon this subject which shall meet the views of a majority here, and most in favor of such a form as shall most clearly express the meaning that we have and guard the faith of the nation, I hope we shall pass no resolution until it shall be the expression of both Houses of Congress. I hope, therefore, this proposition will be referred to the Committee on Finance for the purpose of giving it such form as shall commend it further to us.

Mr. CATTELL. Mr. President, my object in offering this resolution was that we should have from this body a prompt denial of the doctrine contained in this message to go out with it to the world. A legislative enactment such as the joint resolution proposed by the Senator from Vermont, which was on our tables at the last session, will necessarily bring up some debate, or require some time, at any rate, in its passage. The House of Representatives, I think, pursued the same course which I have now proposed: they introduced and passed a resolution of their own body; and I felt that it was exceedingly desirable that the Senate should at once promptly declare its views in relation to this proposition.

Moreover, sir, this proposition of the President differs from all others. There is no question in this proposition as to whether the debt shall be paid in greenbacks or in coin. The suggestion is that it shall not be paid at all; and it occurs to me that so open and undisguised a proposition as this ought to be met, at least, by a prompt and decided expression of the Senate of the United States against it. When the other question comes up, it involves, perhaps, some points on which there will be found differences of opinion. As to this, I think there can scarcely be found a solitary individual in the Senate of the United States who will not disagree to the message of the President, at any rate as I understand it; and therefore I should prefer that the Senate would agree to pass this resolution now rather than refer it. My motion for reference was at the suggestion of a friend. I leave the question entirely for the judgment of the Senate.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I rise rather for the purpose of making a suggestion to the honorable mover of this resolution, to see whether he will not consent to strike out all after the word "crime." It seems to me that the rest has been so often stated that it would be useless again to repeat it. I think if the resolution could be amended in that respect no member of this body, whatever his views may be upon the manner of payment, would vote against the proposition. No right-minded man of any party, I care not where he is, would dare stand up here in the presence of the intelligence of this day and say that he was in favor of repudiating the public debt of this country. It is a great crime to suggest it; it is a crime to think of it; and a double crime for a person standing in the position of the Executive of this nation to send forth that alarming statement to the country. What we need and what our public credit needs is that it be sustained and be confidently upheld by everybody of all parties. I attribute this suggestion of this dying Executive to the fact that he is dying; that he has been so long opposed to the successful operations of the Government that involuntarily, in his death-struggle, he gives an expiring kick. He has made an attempt which I think this body and this Congress will be prepared to meet.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to ask of the Chair if this resolution was offered this morning?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution was offered this morning?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Is it too late to ask that it shall lie over until to-morrow?

Several SENATORS. It has been debated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I suppose an objection would carry it over, although the better construction of the rule ought to be that that objection should be made before debate is had.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from New Jersey appealed to the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce the resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. He said for reference.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The appeal to the Senate for unanimous leave to introduce the resolution was not a consent of the Senate that it should be considered now; but I will suggest to the Chair that when the Senator introduced it he continued to occupy the floor, and it would have been almost rude on the part of any Senator while he was expressing his views about his own resolution to object to the further consideration of it. I think this resolution ought to lie over. It is quite enough, as the distinguished Senator from Vermont has said, that it does not express any one proposition distinctly in regard to the obligations of the Government toward the public debt. If there is a difference between the letter and the spirit of the law, clearly Congress in stating anything about it ought to state what that difference is. I knew very well during all the summer that the contest, so far as it was presented at Chicago, on this important question was made upon an equivocal proposition, as the Senator from Vermont now says. This debt is to be paid not only according to the letter but according to the spirit of the laws under which it was contracted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator insist on his objection to the consideration of the resolution?

Mr. HENDRICKS. If it is to be referred, I will not.

Mr. CONNESS. Let it be referred.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Senators suggest that they are going to refer it, and so I will not insist on my objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The objection is withdrawn. The question is on the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to make another remark or two. I understand this proposition is the platform of a political party of last year. I should like to have the opportunity to present, when this is considered, as an amendment to it or substitute for it, the proposition of another political party presented to the people in the last contest. My own opinion is that that platform presents the real doctrine in regard to our public debt more correctly, and presents it as it was claimed by very many persons during the last contest, that this resolution should be so construed as to agree with the New York platform.

If the Senator from New Jersey wishes to rebuke the President of the United States it is not becoming that the rebuke shall be contained in equivocal language. If the President be wrong and the Senate intends to state what is the right it ought to state it. This does not. This assumes that between the letter of the law and the spirit of the law under which the debt was contracted there is a difference. What is that difference? Is the letter of the law that the debt shall be paid in the lawful money of the United States, but is the spirit of the law according to the judgment of the Senator from New Jersey, according to the judgment of the Senator from Vermont, that it shall be paid in gold? Now, we are not dealing with this question with a view to a political result, I presume; and if the Senate makes a declaration on this question at all, it ought to be done frankly and fully, especially if it is to be regarded as a rebuke to the Chief Magistrate of the country. He has declared his views upon it, in which I do not concur; but if he is to be rebuked, let him be rebuked plainly. If it is the business of the Senate to pass resolutions intended to be those of censure, let them declare the true doctrine as the doctrine instead of that contained in the President's message.

Now, I want to know from the Senator from New Jersey who presents this resolution what does it mean? By this resolution does he undertake to say that there is a difference between the spirit and the letter of the law?

If so, what is that difference? And if there be such a difference, what doctrine in regard to the payment of the public debt does he intend to declare by this resolution? Does he intend to declare that the debt must be paid in coin, or that in part it may be paid in the lawful money of the United States? My opinion is that the debt is to be paid according to the contract. The law is the contract. In the absence of a provision that it is to be paid in gold it is at the discretion of the Government to pay in gold or the lawful money of the United States. Now, what is the opinion of the Senator from New Jersey? He wants to rebuke the President. By what sentiment does he intend to rebuke him? By saying that this contract between the Government and the bondholder is a gold contract? Is that the construction? What was meant by this resolution as to the difference between the spirit and the letter of the law? It is well enough now that we should state what was meant by language that entered so largely into the discussions of last year, and I am glad the Senator has offered this resolution, for now we shall know, as a matter of course, exactly what is meant.

Mr. CATTELL. Mr. President, in reply to the remarks of the Senator from Indiana, I desire only to say that when the proper time arrives for the consideration of the subject to which he alludes I shall be prepared to answer any of the several inquiries which he has propounded to me. The object of this resolution was simply to express the disapprobation of the Senate in regard to that portion of the President's message which I read and commented upon; and in doing so I added to that general form of expression of opinion an expression which has been passed upon by a body higher than the Senate, or the Congress, or the Executive—passed upon by the people of the United States; and I am somewhat surprised to find that so good a Democrat as my friend from Indiana is disposed now, after that high court has passed upon this question, to propose to incorporate upon this resolution a portion of the platform which has been condemned by the people.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Will the Senator allow me to ask him one question? Did the people decide, in voting upon this resolution, in favor of paying the debt in gold or in the lawful money of the United States?

Mr. CATTELL. I think they decided that the resolution of the Chicago platform was very much preferable to that issued in New York. I think that was the great decision made on that occasion. But, Mr. President, as I remarked in rising, when it shall become necessary to discuss this question in all its length and breadth I shall be prepared to take my ground upon it with as much frankness as the Senator from Indiana will. My object was what I have stated. I should be glad to have a vote to-day on this resolution, but I submit to the better judgment of friends around me, who think it is better to refer the resolution to the committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I wish to ask my friend from Indiana, if I can have his attention, the same question that he asked the Senator from New Jersey: what he understands the people to have decided on that subject in the last campaign? He has better means of knowing than almost any of us, as he lived in a region of country where a good deal was said on that subject. I should really be glad, for information, to be told by the responsible head of the Democratic party precisely what the people did decide as he understands it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, the Senator from Vermont, inasmuch as he belongs to the majority party, ought to be able to answer that question much more satisfactorily than I am presumed to be able to do. If, however, I were to answer the Senator just as I believe, I would say that I think the people really decided nothing upon it. I understand that in the region of the country in which he lives it was claimed that the resolution meant that the spirit of the contract was that the payment should be made in gold, and I presume the people of Vermont decided thus, while I know that in the region of the country in which I live the advocates of the Chicago platform claimed that it meant a payment in lawful money, in very many instances; so that very many persons in our section of the country voted for the candidates standing on the Chicago platform, assuming that that meant that the debt might be paid in lawful money, that that was the spirit of the contract as well as the letter; so I cannot say what was decided.

As the Senator a few moments since remarked, the resolution is equivocal; it declares nothing; and so politicians upon the stump put such construction upon it as suited the particular locality in which they were speaking, and of course no decision was made. But now, when a Senator undertakes to rebuke the President, and to reassert this same doctrine, that the spirit of the law is to prevail as well as the letter of the law, it is due that he should declare exactly what he means. If there be a difference between the letter and the spirit, I should like to know it. Ordinarily we gather the spirit and purpose of the law from the letter. It is to be presumed that the Congress of the United States uses language that expresses its intention. That is the presumption; but this resolution assumes that the letter does not express the intention of Congress; that there is something back of or beyond that which constitutes the spirit of the law. I want to know what that is. If that spirit is gold payment of the debt let us know.

Mr. President, I do not desire now to protract the debate. I have tried to answer the question of the Senator from Vermont, though it is a difficult one to answer.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am really unable to see which way my friend has answered the question; but as it seems to be a little difficult one, I will relieve him from the responsibility now and ask it some other time.

Mr. WILLEY. Mr. President, it strikes me that the whole merit of this question depends upon the speedy and prompt action of the Senate. I doubt whether by referring it to a committee the object can be accomplished; and I question the propriety of bringing up a discussion upon the financial policy of the Government on an abstract resolution of this character. The President's message has gone out to the country. It has its influence, and is at present having its influence at home and abroad on the credit of the country and on the national honor. If we desire to counteract that we ought to do it by some expression of the Senate immediately had. I suggest, therefore, to the honorable Senator from New Jersey whether the resolution could not be so modified as simply to present to the Senate the question as to its opinion upon what the President has proposed himself, that, and no more; not a resolution in a form that will involve whether we are to pay our debt in gold or in the legal currency, or what the policy of the Government on our financial matters heretofore has been, but simply an expression on the part of the Senate condemning so much of the President's message as relates to the repudiation of our public debt, which is a matter entirely different from the manner in which we should pay it. The other day, when his message was read, I drew hastily a resolution of my own; and I desire now to read it to see whether the Senator from New Jersey will not think that it will accomplish the practical purpose which he designs. Inasmuch as it cannot possibly lead to any debate the sense of the Senate can at once go out to the country, and the object of introducing the resolution be accomplished. I had intended to offer a resolution in this form:

That the Senate, properly cherishing and upholding the good faith and honor of the nation, do hereby utterly disapprove of and condemn the sentiments and proposition contained in so much of the late annual message of the President of the United States as reads as follows

And then follow exactly the very words which the Senator from New Jersey read. There is simply an expression of opinion on the part of the Senate condemning the repudiating doctrine set forth in the message—that and no more. It strikes me that at this time, in view of what is due to our honor at home and our credit and honor abroad, the Senate of the United States ought to place upon record some expression of its opinion that it may go out to the country and to the world, pari passu as nearly as may be, with this repudiating doctrine of the President of the United States. I merely throw out the suggestion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to refer the resolution to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WILLEY. At the suggestion of Senators I will offer this as a substitute for the resolution of the Senator from New Jersey, and ask action on it now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is not strictly in order.

Mr. WILLEY. What I propose is to offer the resolution which I have read as a substitute for that submitted by the Senator from New Jersey.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is not now in order, because the motion pending is to refer this resolution to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have the proposition of the Senator from West Virginia read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate, properly cherishing and upholding the good faith and honor of the nation, do hereby utterly disapprove of and condemn the sentiments and proposition contained in so much of the late annual message of the President of the United States as reads as follows: "It may be assumed that the holders of our securities have already received upon their bonds a larger amount than their original investment, measured by a gold standard. Upon this statement of facts it would seem but just and equitable that the six per cent. interest now paid by the Government should be applied to the reduction of the principal in semi-annual installments, which in sixteen years and eight months would liquidate the entire national debt. Six per cent. in gold would at present rates be equal to nine per cent. in currency, and equivalent to the payment of the debt one and a half time in a fraction less than seventeen years. This, in connection with all the other advantages derived from their investment, would afford to the public creditors a fair and liberal compensation for the use of their capital, and with this they should be satisfied. The lessons of the past admonish the lender that it is not well to be over anxious in exacting from the borrower rigid compliance with the letter of the bond."

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the Senate of the United States ought to express in very emphatic language its condemnation of this clause of the President's message. It is the first time, I believe, in the history of this Government that any public man, either in the legislative or executive department of the Government of the United States, has proposed open and plain repudiation. Disputes have often existed as to the terms and meaning of words in laws relating to revenue and relating to loans; there may have been honest differences of opinion; but, so far as I know, no man has ever heretofore undertaken to violate the faith of this country by proposing repudiation of the entire principal of the public debt. This proposition of the President is to substitute in the place of a debt drawing six per cent. interest an obligation to pay only an annuity for sixteen years, and repudiate the principal. So shocking a proposition, coming from the President of the United States, even although defeated as he has been in popular judgment, will excite comment all over the world, and I believe will excite prejudice against our institutions, which ought to be at once counteracted by the legislative department of the Government. I will vote, therefore, for either proposition, that of the Senator from New Jersey or that of the Senator from West Virginia. But it seems to me it would be better to confine the language of the resolution we adopt to the simple repudiation of the proposition of the President of the United States. It seems to me it would be wiser and better to refer this matter to the committee, which will probably be able to report to-morrow either one resolution or the other, as their judgment shall dictate.

Mr. WARNER. I have a resolution to offer to go to the committee with the other resolutions, and I ask that it be read now for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It may be read for information, but resolutions are not now in order. The question is on the reference of the pending resolution to the Committee on Finance. The proposition of the Senator from Alabama may be read for information if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That we regard as dishonest the proposition of the President contained in his message to appropriate the interest of the public debt to the payment of the principal.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I shall vote for none of these propositions in their present shape, and I doubt whether I shall vote for them in any shape in which they may be presented. If the President's message, however, means that which gentlemen seem to conceive it means, repudiation in any form, I condemn the proposition as strongly as any body. I shall not attempt to give any explanation as to the meaning of the President of the United States in his message. That he meant repudiation of the public indebtedness, that he meant to advocate bad faith toward the public creditors or toward any other class of men, I do not for a moment believe. While I have been no partisan of his administration, I will do him the justice to say that his whole life has shown him to be a man who does not repudiate honest and honorable obligations either in public or in private life.

Take warning, Mr. President. There has been but one instance, according to my recollection, since the foundation of this Government, when the Senate of the United States attempted to pass resolutions of censure upon the Chief Executive officer of the nation; but one, and that not upon a mere recommendation of a message to the Senate, but founded upon acts. The Senate of the United States sat in judgment upon the great man who then filled the Chief Executive office of this nation, and the people of the United States afterwards sat in judgment upon them, and the condemnatory resolution has no place upon your journals. It may be, sir, that flushed with triumph, and deeming the future all secure to you and your party, you may think that you may go further and fare no worse. But, sir, although success has accrued to you for the present, the mutations of party are, if not as often repeated, yet as sure as mutations in private life.

But, sir, what would propriety, what would dignity, what would a true consideration for the character of the American Senate seem to require—a body formed for purposes of deliberation, calm, sober deliberation? It would be, if there be any proposition in the message of the President of the United States which you condemn, not to meet it by the simple passage of a resolution, but to meet it by your action. Show to the world that you condemn it, not by the simple passage of a resolution, but by acts of legislation showing to the creditors of the nation by your acts securing their debt evidence upon which they can firmly and confidently rely that the American Congress means, under any and all circumstances, to discharge the obligations of the country with fidelity; not a simple resolution passed to-day and gone to-morrow; passed to-day and not remembered at all hereafter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to refer the resolution of the Senator from New Jersey to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RICE. I wish to renew the motion I made the other day in regard to adding two members to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad. I do not think there is any serious opposition to it, and I wish it taken up and acted upon now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas moves that two members be added to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

Mr. WILLEY. I desire to inquire whether the resolution I offered awhile ago goes to the Committee on Finance?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No; it was not strictly in order under that motion. It may go as an independent proposition, if the Senator moves it.

Mr. WILLEY. I move that it be referred to the committee, also.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a question pending—the motion of the Senator from Arkansas to add two members to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

Mr. WILSON. I suggest to the Senator from Arkansas to let this matter lie over to-day. The chairman of the committee has not been here this session. I think there will be no difficulty about settling the question.

Mr. RICE. At the suggestion of Senators I will let my motion lie over until the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. HOWARD,] the chairman of the committee, arrives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion will lie over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. WILLEY] moves that the Senate proceed to consider the resolution offered by him. No objection being made, the resolution will be read again.

Mr. FOWLER. Is it understood that the resolution is to be passed to-day?

Several SENATORS. Oh, no; only to be referred.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate, properly cherishing and upholding the good faith and honor of the nation, do hereby utterly disapprove of and condemn the sentiments and proposition contained in so much of the late annual message of the President of the United States as reads as follows.

Mr. CONNESS. That has already been read. I move to refer it to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There was a resolution offered by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. WARNER] which will be taken up.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That we regard as dishonest the proposition of the President contained in his message to appropriate the interest of the public debt to the payment of the principal.

Mr. CONNESS. I move that that have the same reference.

The motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution, and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate:

A bill (S. No. 555) to authorize the Secretary of State to adjust the claim of Gustavus G. Cushman for office rent while commissioner under the reciprocity treaty;

A bill (S. No. 186) providing for the sale of the lands, tenements, and water privileges belonging to the United States at and near Harper's Ferry, in the county of Jefferson, West Virginia; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 170) in relation to the library of the Department of Agriculture.

COMMITTEE ON ORDNANCE.

Mr. CAMERON. The other day when the standing committees were appointed the chairman of the joint Committee on Ordnance was not present, and in consequence thereof the committee on that subject was suffered to expire. I move that it be continued, so that the committee may have an opportunity of closing up their business.

The motion was agreed to.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. SHERMAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to communicate to the Senate the report of Mr. Williams, Government director of the Union Pacific railroad, on the condition of said road.

ADJOURNMENT FOR THE HOLIDAYS.

Mr. COLE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution relating to the adjournment for the holidays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That has been objected to, and the objection carries it over to-day unless it be withdrawn.

Mr. CONNESS. It may not be objected to now.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not suppose anybody will object.

Mr. COLE. I presume the objection made related to some question then pending which it was desirable to dispose of.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That when the two Houses of Congress adjourn on Monday, the 21st instant, they adjourn to meet on Tuesday, the 5th of January, 1869.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution of the House of Representatives.

Mr. SUMNER. I move to amend the resolution by striking out "Monday, the 21st" and inserting "Wednesday, the 23d." It seems to me we ought not to adjourn so early. I call for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 26, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cameron, Corbett, Dixon, Edmunds, Fessenden, Harlan, Harris, Kellogg, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Osborn, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Rice, Ross, Sherman, Spencer, Sumner, Thayer, Trumbull, Wade, Warner, Wilson, and Yates—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cattell, Cole, Conkling, Conness, Davis, Doolittle, Fowler, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, McCreery, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Nye, Pool, Robertson, Saulsbury, Sawyer, Sprague, Stewart, Tipton, Vickers, Whyte, Willey, and Williams—27.

ABSENT—Messrs. Abbott, Bayard, Chandler, Cragin, Drake, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Howard, McDonald, Norton, Van Winkle, and Welch—13.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the resolution.

Mr. THAYER called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 36, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Conness, Corbett, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fowler, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Kellogg, McCreery, McDonald, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Nye, Osborn, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pool, Ramsey, Robertson, Saulsbury, Sawyer, Sprague, Stewart, Vickers, Whyte, and Willey—36.

NAYS—Messrs. Cameron, Fessenden, Harlan, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Rice, Sherman, Spencer, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Wade, Warner, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—19.

ABSENT—Messrs. Abbott, Bayard, Cragin, Drake, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Howard, Norton, Ross, Van Winkle, and Welch—11.

So the resolution was concurred in.

Mr. CONKLING. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, December 14, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock m.
The Journal of Thursday last was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This being Monday, the first business in order is the call of States and Territories, commencing with the State of Maine, for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions, for reference to their appropriate committees, not to be brought back by motions to reconsider. During this call resolutions of State or territorial Legislatures may be presented.

DEFENSE OF NORTHEASTERN FRONTIER.

Mr. PETERS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1498) to provide for the defense of the northeastern frontier; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. PETERS. I move the reference of this bill to a select committee of seven members.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. What is the necessity of multiplying committees? Why should not this bill go the appropriate standing committee?

Mr. PETERS. The standing committees are very full of business; and if this be referred to a standing committee there may not be an opportunity to report it during this session.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The appropriate committee is the Committee on Military Affairs, and that committee is certainly not very full of business.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to refer the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The motion to refer to a standing committee takes precedence of the motion to refer to a select committee.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. SCHENCK, there were—ayes 53, noes 42; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER, under the rules, ordered tellers; and appointed Messrs. SCHENCK and PETERS.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 65, noes 48.

So the motion of Mr. SCHENCK was agreed to; and the bill was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PETERS. I hope that, by unanimous consent, the reference of this bill will be changed so as to refer it to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. The Committee on Military Affairs will probably be unable to report again during this session.

Mr. GARFIELD. I cannot consent to that. The Committee on Foreign Affairs has nothing to do with this subject. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred, and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. References made during the morning hour of Monday cannot be reconsidered.

KU-KLUX OUTRAGES.

Mr. ARNELL. I submit the following preamble and resolution, and ask the previous question upon them:

Whereas Ku-Klux outrages continue to be practiced upon peaceable and law-abiding citizens of the United States in the State of Tennessee and elsewhere; Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Reconstruction be, and is hereby, instructed to inquire carefully into this whole matter, and to report to the House, by bill or otherwise, at the earliest day possible.

* The question was upon seconding the previous question.

Mr. BROOKS. Does this resolution embrace all the States where outrages are committed, not only the southern States but the northern and western States?

Mr. ARNELL. Wherever there are Ku-Klux organizations.

Mr. BROOKS. I shall object to it unless it embraces all the States where there are outrages. I call for a division of the question.

The SPEAKER. The question will first be taken upon the resolution, and then upon the preamble.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

The question recurred upon the preamble.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the preamble was agreed to.

Mr. ARNELL moved to reconsider the votes by which the preamble and resolution were agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TWENTY PER CENT. COMPENSATION.

Mr. STOKES introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 384) granting additional compensation to certain employes in the civil service of the Government at Washington; which was read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. STOKES. Upon that question I call the previous question.

The joint resolution, which was read, provides that there shall be allowed and paid out of any money applicable to the purpose, heretofore or hereafter to be appropriated, to the same classes of officers and other persons in the civil service of the United States Government at Washington embraced in the joint resolution of Congress entitled "Joint resolution giving additional compensation to certain employes in the civil service of the Government at Washington," passed February 28, 1867, an additional compensation of twenty per cent. on their respective salaries as fixed by law or where no salary is fixed by law, upon their pay respectively from and after the 30th day of June, 1867, to the 30th day of June, 1869. But if any such officer or other person shall have performed service for less than one year, he or she is to be allowed the twenty per cent. upon the sum he or she may have actually received for such service. All such additional compensation as may be due to the employes of the Patent Office is to be paid out of the funds of that office. The resolution is not to apply to persons whose salaries as fixed by law exceed $2,500. It is to include such persons as have been employed in any capacity in the Government Printing Office or in any of the Departments; the watchmen on the Dome of the Capitol and in the Capitol grounds; the inspector of marble; the foremen of mechanics at work on the Capitol extension; the watchmen in said extension, whether inside or out, and the employes of the jail.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I raise the point of order that this joint resolution contains an appropriation and must receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point. The resolution provides that the money shall be paid out of any appropriation applicable to the purpose heretofore made or hereafter to be made. The resolution itself will not take any money from the Treasury.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. STOKES] has called the previous question, which takes precedence of the motion to refer.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I move that the joint resolution be laid on the table.

Mr. WARD. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MAYNARD. If the previous question be seconded can we then have a vote upon the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN,] to refer the joint resolution?

The SPEAKER. If the previous question be seconded the motion to refer will not then be in order.

Mr. MILLER. I ask that the resolution be again read.

The Clerk again read the joint resolution.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I rise to a question of order. I submit that, notwithstanding the decision of the Chair, this resolution does contain an appropriation, because it directs money to be paid out of the patent fund, and therefore it cannot be considered at this time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. To bring a bill or joint resolution within the rule it must make an appropriation out of the Treasury.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. In answer to that, I would suggest to the Speaker that Congress at its last session directed the patent fund to be paid into the Treasury; hence the money which this resolution proposes to appropriate is now in the Treasury.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Iowa that the Digest prohibits the renewal of a point of order after it has been overruled, even though it be presented with additional reasons. The gentleman ought to have presented his reasons when the point was first raised.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I would suggest to the Chair that I did not make the point of order in the first instance; and, more than that, there was so much confusion in the Hall that my attention was not called to this feature of the resolution until its second reading.

The SPEAKER. By the statement of the gentleman from Iowa it is obviously too late for him to raise the point, even if it were a good one; for it did not occur to him until the resolution had been read a second time, and mean while the previous question had been called, a motion made to lay the joint resolution on the table, and the yeas and nays called and ordered upon it.

The question was taken on the motion to lay the joint resolution on the table; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 91, nays 73, not voting 57; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Bailey, Baker, Baldwin, Beaman, Beatty, Benjamin, Benton, Bingham, Blair, Boutwell, Boyden, Broomall, Buckley, Churchill, Reader W. REPUDIATION OF THE NATIONAL DEBT.

Mr. BROOMALL. I offer the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas the President of the United States, in his annual message to the Fortieth Congress at its third session, says: "It may be assumed that the holders of our securities have already received upon their bonds a larger amount than their original investment, measured by a gold standard. Upon this statement of facts it would seem but just and equitable that the six per cent. interest now paid by the Government should be applied to the reduction of the principal in semi-annual installments, which in sixteen years and eight months would liquidate the entire national debt. Six per cent. in gold would at present rates be equal to nine per cent. in currency, and equivalent to the payment of the debt one and a half time in a fraction less than seven years. Thus, in connection with all the other advantages derived from their investment, would afford to the public creditors a fair and liberal compensation for the use of their capital, and with this they should be satisfied. The lessons of the past admonish the lender that it is not well to be over-anxious in exacting from the borrower rigid compliance with the letter of the bond;" and whereas such sentiments, if permitted to go to the world without immediate protest, may be understood to be the sentiments of the people of the United States and their Representatives in Congress: Therefore,

Resolved, That all forms and degrees of repudiation of national indebtedness are odious to the American people. And that under no circumstances will their Representatives consent to offer the public creditor, as full compensation, a less amount of money than that which the Government contracted to pay him.

Mr. ROSS. I object.

Mr. BROOMALL. I move to suspend the rules.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I ask the gentleman to let the resolution be printed. It is too much to ask us to pass upon a resolution of this character and length without having it before us.

Mr. BROOMALL. It has been printed in the public papers some days.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I mean on our files. I do not care to look at the public papers so far as concerns bills and resolutions that we are to act upon here.

Mr. BROOMALL. It is very short and simple.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania move to suspend the rules for the purpose of adopting the resolution?

Mr. BROOMALL. For the purpose of considering and adopting it.

The SPEAKER. Then it will be open for debate.

Mr. BROOMALL. I do not say I will not yield for an amendment.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will state exactly what he desires the Chair will put the motion.

Mr. BROOMALL. What I desire is to have the resolution considered now, but I do not want to prevent all amendment to make it better or stronger.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves to suspend the rules for the purpose of introducing the resolution. If the motion is carried the resolution will then be before the House and open to debate.

Mr. MAYNARD. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. RANDALL. Would it be in order to ask for a division of the resolution?

The SPEAKER. Not now; it will be on the question of agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. RANDALL. I give notice that I will call for a division of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question will then be on the preamble and that part of the resolution on which a separate vote is not demanded.

Mr. PRUYN. Before that will it be in order to move to amend?

The SPEAKER. The resolution is not yet before the House.

The question was taken on suspending the rules; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 135, nays 29, not voting 57; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Beatty, Benjamin, Bingham, Blair, Boutwell, Bowen, Boyden, Broomall, Buckley, Roderick R. Butler, Callis, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Corley, Covode, Cullom, Dawes, Deweese, Dickey, Dixon, Dockery, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Edwards, Eggleston, Eli, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Fields, French, Garfield, Gove, Gravely, Griswold, Haughey, Hawkins, Higby, Hooper, Hopkins, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Alexander H. Jones, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kelsey, Ketcham, Kitchen, Koontz, Lash, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Longbridge, Lynch, Mallory, Marvin, Maynard, McCarthy, McKee, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrell, Morrissey, Mullins, Myers, Newsham, Norris, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pettis, Pike, Plants, Poland, Polsley, Price, Rann, Robertson, Schenck, Scofield, Shanks, Smith, Spalding, Starkweather, Stewart, Stokes, Stover, Sypher, Taffe, Taylor, Thomas, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upton, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburne, William Whittemore, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—135.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Axtell, Beck, Boyer, Brooks, Burr, Cary, Chanler, Eldridge, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Grover, Holman, Humphrey, Thomas L. Jones, Kerr, Knott, McCormick, Mungen, Niblack, Phelps, Pruyn, Robinson, Ross, Sitgreaves, Stone, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Trump, Wood, Woodward, and Young—29.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Barnes, Barnum, Benton, Blackburn, Blaine, Boies, Boyer, Bromwell, Buckland, Benjamin F. Butler, Cake, Chanler, Clift, Cornell, Delano, Dodge, Eldridge, Ferry, Fox, Glossbrenner, Goss, Haight, Halsey, Hamilton, Harding, Heaton, Hill, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hulburd, Johnson, Kellogg, Kerr, Lafin, Logan, McCullough, Newcomb, Nicholson, Nunn, Pierce, Pile, Pomeroy, Prince, Randall, Roots, Sawyer, Selye, Shellabarger, Stevens, Taber, Tift, John Trimble, Van Auker, Robert T. Van Horn, Vidal, and Thomas Williams—57.

So (two thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended.

Mr. BROOMALL. I do not propose to debate the resolution. The language of it is as plain and clear as it can be made by any words of mine. I do not desire to have the resolution debated at much length. I propose therefore to call the previous question, unless some gentleman wishes to say something on the subject.

Mr. PRUYN. I should like to say something.

Mr. BROOMALL. How short?

Mr. PRUYN. Five or ten minutes.

Mr. BROOMALL. I am urged all around to call the previous question, and I do so.

Mr. WOOD. Will the gentleman allow a communication from the President to be read?

Mr. BROOMALL. I am urged all around not to take up the time of the House, but to call the previous question, and I do so.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, I ask a division of the resolution.

Mr. PRUYN. Will the gentleman allow me to offer a substitute for the resolution?

Mr. BROOMALL. No, sir.

The SPEAKER. At what point does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] desire a division?

Mr. RANDALL. After the word "repudiation." The first part of the resolution is an expression of opinion; the second proposes to say what we shall not do in the future.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman desires a division after the word "people."

Mr. RANDALL. Yes; after the word "people."

The SPEAKER. The resolution is divisible at that point.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to ask the privilege of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROOMALL] who introduced the resolution to say a few words in reference to the last clause of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. That would require the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. He has one hour to discuss the resolution after the previous question is seconded.

The SPEAKER. He has not, not having reported the resolution. If he had reported the resolution from a committee he would have been entitled to an hour; but having simply offered the resolution he has not that right.

Mr. PRUYN. I hope the gentleman will allow my substitute to be read. [Cries of "No, no," and "Object."]

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read that part of the resolution on which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] demands a separate vote.

The Clerk read as follows:

And that under no circumstances will their Representatives consent to offer the public creditor, as full compensation, a less amount of money than that which the Government contracted to pay him.

Mr. RANDALL. Now, I want to say that the first proposition contained in that resolution—

Mr. BROOMALL. I object to debate.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the preamble and the first part of the resolution.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I demand a division so as to have a separate vote on the preamble.

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated that the previous question would operate on the preamble and resolution unless some gentleman demanded a separate vote. It was not demanded. The preamble simply recites an extract from the President's message.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I think it does not recite all that it ought to in order to show what the President meant.

Mr. RANDALL. I supposed that the preamble and resolution required a separate vote. That is the usual course. But I want to call the yeas and nays on the first part of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. A separate vote could have been had if gentlemen had demanded it in time.

Mr. RANDALL. It has been the custom to have a separate vote on the preamble.

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated distinctly that if a separate vote was required it must be asked. The question now is on the preamble and the first part of the resolution, being that part not reserved by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.]

Mr. RANDALL. I think the Speaker misconceives what I desire to get at. I want a naked vote on the first part of the resolution, disconnected altogether from the preamble.

Mr. BROOMALL. You cannot have that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has stated the parliamentary condition of the question. It is, unfortunately, too late to call for a separate vote on the preamble except by unanimous consent.

Mr. RANDALL. Then the Speaker declines to entertain the demand for a division of the question.

The SPEAKER. He does; as he stated previously, that the vote would be taken together unless a separate vote was demanded. He gave an opportunity to the House to ask a separate vote and no gentleman took advantage of it.

Mr. RANDALL. I took advantage of it to call for a division of the resolution. I supposed that of course there would be a separate vote on the preamble.

The yeas and nays were then ordered upon the preamble and first clause of the resolution.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to say that we here understood that a separate vote would be taken upon the preamble. I move, for that purpose, to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. RANDALL. Upon that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 134, nays 37, not voting 50; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Beatty, Benjamin, Benton, Bingham, Blair, Boutwell, Bowen, Boyden, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckley, Roderick R. Butler, Callis, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Clift, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Corley, Covode, Cullom, Dawes, Deweese, Dickey, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Edwards, Eggleston, Eliot, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, French, Garfield, Goss, Gove, Gravely, Griswold, Haughey, Higby, Hooper, Hopkins, Chester D. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Lynch, Mallory, Marvin, Maynard, McCarthy, McKee, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrell, Mullins, Myers, Newsham, Norris, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pettis, Pike, Plants, Poland, Price, Prince, Raum, Robertson, Schenck, Scofield, Shanks, Smith, Spalding, Starkweather, Stevens, Stewart, Stokes, Stover, Taffe, Taylor, Thomas, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upton, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Van Wyck, Vidal, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburne, William Whittemore, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—134.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Axtell, Beck, Boyer, Brooks, Burr, Cary, Chanler, Eldridge, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Grover, Holman, Hotchkiss, Humphrey, Thomas L. Jones, Kerr, Knott, McCormick, McCullough, Mungen, Niblack, Phelps, Pruyn, Randall, Robinson, Ross, Stone, Taber, Tift, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Trump, Wood, Woodward, and Young—37.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Barnes, Barnum, Blackburn, Blaine, Boies, Buckland, Benjamin F. Butler, Cake, Cornell, Delano, Dockery, Dodge, Eli, Farnsworth, Fox, Haight, Halsey, Hamilton, Harding, Hawkins, Heaton, Hill, Asahel W. Hubbard, Johnson, Kellogg, Lafin, Loan, Logan, Longbridge, Marshall, Morrissey, Newcomb, Nicholson, Nunn, Pierce, Pike, Polsley, Pomeroy, Roots, Sawyer, Selye, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Sypher, John Trimble, Van Auker, Robert T. Van Horn, and Thomas Williams—60.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The question recurred upon agreeing to the preamble and first clause of the resolution, as follows:

Whereas the President of the United States, in his annual message to the Fortieth Congress at its third session, says: "It may be assumed that the holders of our securities have already received upon their bonds a larger amount than their original investment, measured by a gold standard. Upon this statement of facts it would seem but just and equitable that the six per cent. interest now paid by the Government should be applied to the reduction of the principal in semi-annual installments, which in sixteen years and eight months would liquidate the entire national debt. Six per cent. in gold would at present rates be equal to nine per cent. in currency, and equivalent to the payment of the debt one and a half time in a fraction less than seventeen years. This, in connection with all the other advantages derived from their investment, would afford to the public creditors a fair and liberal compensation for the use of their capital, and with this they should be satisfied. The lessons of the past admonish the lender that it is not well to be overanxious in exacting from the borrower rigid compliance with the letter of the bond," and whereas such sentiments, if permitted to go to the world without immediate protest, may be understood to be the sentiments of the people of the United States and their Representatives in Congress: Therefore,

Resolved, That all forms and degrees of repudiation of national indebtedness are odious to the American people.

Upon this question the yeas and nays had been ordered.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to lay the preamble on the table; and on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 37, nays 133, not voting 51; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Axtell, Beck, Boyer, Burr, Cary, Chanler, Sidney Clarke, Eldridge, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Grover, Holman, Hotchkiss, Humphrey, Thomas H. Jones, Kerr, Knott, Marshall, McCormick, McCullough, Mungen, Niblack, Pruyn, Randall, Robinson, Ross, Sitgreaves, Taber, Tift, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Trump, Wood, Woodward, and Young—37.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Beatty, Benjamin, Benton, Bingham, Boutwell, Bowen, Boyden, Broomall, Buckley, Roderick R. Butler, Callis, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Corley, Covode, Cullom, Dawes, Deweese, Dickey, Dixon, Dockery, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Edwards, Eggleston, Ela, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, French, Garfield, Goss, Gravelly, Griswold, Haughey, Higby, Hooper, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hubbard, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Alexander H. Jones, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kellogg, Kelsey, Ketcham, Kitchen, Koontz, Lash, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Loughridge, Lynch, Mallory, Marvin, Maynard, McCarthy, McKee, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrell, Morrissey, Mullins, Myers, Newsham, Norris, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pettis, Phelps, Plants, Poland, Polsley, Price, Raum, Robertson, Schenck, Scofield, Shanks, Smith, Spaulding, Starkweather, Stevens, Stewart, Stokes, Stover, Taffe, Taylor, Thomas, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Van Wyck, Vidal, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Whittemore, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—133.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Barnes, Barnum, Blackburn, Blaine, Blair, Boies, Brownell, Brooks, Buckland, Benjamin F. Butler, Cake, Clift, Cornell, Delano, Dodge, Fox, Gove, Haight, Halsey, Hamilton, Harding, Hawkins, Heaton, Hill, Asabel W. Hubbard, Johnson, Laffin, Loan, Logan, Newcomb, Nicholson, Nunn, Pierce, Pike, Pile, Pomeroy, Price, Prince, Roots, Sawyer, Selye, Shellabarger, Stone, Sypher, John Trimble, Van Auken, Robert T. Van Horn, Cadwalader C. Washburn, and Thomas Williams—51.

So the preamble was not laid on the table.

The question recurred upon agreeing to the preamble and first clause of the resolution, upon which the yeas and nays had been ordered.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. As I understand, Mr. Speaker, a negative vote on this question will indorse the extract from the President's message and favor repudiation.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 155, nays 6, not voting 60; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Axtell, Bailey, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Barnum, Beaman, Beatty, Benjamin, Benton, Bingham, Blair, Boutwell, Bowen, Boyden, Boyer, Broomall, Buckley, Roderick R. Butler, Callis, Cary, Chanler, Churchill, Reader W. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Loughridge, Lynch, Mallory, Marvin, McCarthy, McKee, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrell, Morrissey, Mullins, Myers, Newsham, Norris, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pettis, Phelps, Pike, Pile, Plants, Poland, Polsley, Price, Prince, Raum, Randall, Raum, Robertson, Robinson, Schenck, Scofield, Shanks, Stewart, Stokes, Stover, Sypher, Taber, Taffe, Taylor, Thomas, Tift, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Whittemore, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Wood, Woodbridge, and Woodward—155.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Grover, Thomas L. Jones, Mungen, and Lawrence S. Trimble—6.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Barnes, Beck, Blackburn, Blaine, Boies, Brownell, Brooks, Buckland, Burr, Benjamin F. Butler, Cake, Clift, Cobb, Cornell, Gravelly, Haight, Halsey, Eldridge, Fox, Golladay, Gravelly, Haight, Halsey, Hamilton, Harding, Heaton, Hill, Holman, Asabel W. Hubbard, Humphrey, Johnson, Kerr, Knott, W. Hubbard, Humphrey, Johnson, Kerr, Knott, Laffin, Logan, Marshall, Maynard, McCormick, Mc-Cullough, Newcomb, Niblack, Nicholson, Nunn, Pierce, Pomeroy, Roots, Ross, Sawyer, Selye, Shellabarger, Stone, John Trimble, Van Auken, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Vidal, Thomas Williams, and Young—60.

So the preamble and first clause of the resolution were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now report the second part of the resolution, upon which a separate vote was called for by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.]

The Clerk read as follows:

And that under no circumstances will their Representatives consent to offer the public creditor, as full compensation, a less amount of money than that which the Government contracted to pay him.

The second part of the resolution was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill and a joint resolution of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 565) to authorize the Secretary of State to adjust the claim of Gustavus G. Cushman for office rent while commissioner under the reciprocity treaty; and Joint resolution (S. R. No. 170) in relation to the library of the Department of Agriculture.

FRAUDULENT VOTING IN NEW YORK.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I present under the rule a memorial of the Union League Club of New York, in reference to fraudulent voting in the city and State of New York; and I ask consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the memorial from the Union League Club of New York be printed, and that a select committee of seven be appointed to investigate the irregularities and frauds therein alleged to have occurred in the city and State of New York affecting the recent election for Representatives to Congress and electors for President and Vice President, and report thereon to this House; and that the said committee may hold sessions in the State of New York and elsewhere by a quorum or by sub-committees of such number as the committee shall delegate; and that they have power to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths to witnesses, and to employ a clerk and messenger, with such stenographic assistance as they shall find necessary.

Mr. WOOD. I object to the introduction of the resolution.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I move to suspend the rules, that the resolution may be introduced and agreed to at this time.

Mr. WOOD. If the gentleman from Ohio will give us an opportunity to have a few words of discussion upon this resolution I will withdraw all objection so far as I am concerned.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I insist on my motion.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I would inquire of the gentleman from Ohio whether the election referred to is not now being investigated under the authority of the people of New York?

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. A respectable portion of the people of New York have sent here a memorial asking the adoption of this resolution. If the gentleman will examine the memorial he will find in it abundant evidence that it is presented in good faith.

The SPEAKER. The motion to suspend the rules is not debatable except by unanimous consent.

Mr. CHANLER. I object to debate.

Mr. BROOKS. Does the memorial of the Union League Club accompany this resolution?

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. BROOKS. Let us hear it read.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I should like to have it read. Let it be read by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. In order that the memorial may be read the gentleman from Ohio must first waive his motion to suspend the rules. The gentleman from New York has the right under the rule to have this memorial read, but the motion to suspend the rules covers that and all other rules.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I do not object to the reading of the memorial, and I will waive the motion to suspend the rules for the present so that the memorial may be read, provided that at the conclusion of the reading the motion can be resumed.

Mr. BROOKS. What I wish to suggest to the gentleman from Ohio is this: that when a partisan body makes an ex parte representation it is but fair that the Representatives of the city and State of New York upon this floor should have an opportunity to reply to this memorial. I do not think there should be any objection to that.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. The reading of the memorial was called for by gentlemen on the other side of the House. If this investigation be had there will be abundant opportunity afforded to gentlemen for reply to this memorial. Both sides of the question can be examined into.

Mr. BROOKS. What I wish to suggest further, that the Union League of New York city contributed hundreds of thousands of dollars to carry the States of Ohio and Indiana. I would like to know whether the whole country is to be investigated, and whether we are to know the amount of money given by the Union League of New York to carry Ohio and Indiana.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I object to the reading of the memorial.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I should like to have the gentleman from New York tell us what has become of Helmbold's subscription.

Mr. ROBINSON. I rise to a parliamentary question. I ask, if it be in order, for a division of the resolution. The last resolution provides for one man to have the run of the hotels, subjecting the Government to heavy expenses.

The SPEAKER. The motion to suspend the rules suspends that rule with all others. Under the rule the gentleman can ask for a division of the resolution, but if two thirds vote to suspend the rules that rule is suspended with all others.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] at the last session proposed that none of these special committees should be allowed to run the Government into debt. This resolution does the very thing he then protested against.

The SPEAKER. If that resolution had been adopted a two thirds vote would suspend that with all other rules.

Mr. RANDALL. Then, this committee can run this Government into any amount of indebtedness.

Mr. ROBINSON. They are all doing it now.

The House divided on the motion to suspend the rules; and there were—ayes 104, noes 42.

Mr. SCHENCK. There seems to be a good many gentlemen opposed to this resolution, and I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 134, nays 35, not voting 52; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Beatty, Benjamin, Benton, Bingham, Blair, Boutwell, Bowen, Boyden, Brownell, Brooks, Broomall, Buckley, Roderick R. Butler, Callis, Chanler, Churchill, Sidney Clarke, Clift, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Corley, Covode, Dawes, Deweese, Dickey, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Edwards, Eggleston, Ela, Eliot, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Garfield, Goss, Gove, Gravelly, Griswold, Haughey, Hawkins, Higby, Hooper, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hunter, Jenckes, Alexander H. Jones, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kellogg, Kelsey, Ketcham, Kitchen, Koontz, Lash, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Lynch, Mallory, Marvin, Maynard, McCarthy, McKee, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrell, Morrissey, Mullins, Myers, Newsham, Norris, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pettis, Pike, Pile, Plants, Poland, Polsley, Price, Prince, Raum, Robertson, Schenck, Scofield, Shanks, Spaulding, Starkweather, Stevens, Stewart, Stokes, Stover, Taylor, Thomas, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Van Wyck, Vidal, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Whittemore, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Woodbridge—134.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Axtell, Beck, Boyer, Burr, Cary, Eldridge, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Grover, Holman, Hotchkiss, Humphrey, Thomas L. Jones, Kerr, Marshall, McCormick, McCullough, Munson, Niblack, Phelps, Pruyn, Randall, Robinson, Sigheaves, Stone, Taber, Tift, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Trump, Wood, Woodward, and Young—35.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Barnes, Barnum, Blackburn, Blaine, Boies, Buckland, Benjamin F. Butler, Calkins, Reador W. Clarke, Cornell, Cullom, Delano, Dockery, Dodge, Farnsworth, Fox, French, Haight, Halsey, Hamilton, Harding, Hcaton, Hill, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Johnson, Knott, Laffin, Logan, Loughridge, Newcomb, Nicholson, Nunn, Pierce, Pomroy, Roots, Ross, Sawyer, Selye, Shellabarger, Smith, Sypher, Taffe, John Trimble, Van Anken, Robert T. Van Horn, Thomas Williams, and Windom—52.

So (two thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended, and the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote, by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HAMLIN, one of its Secretaries, informed the House that the Senate had reappointed the joint committee appointed at the first session of the present Congress and continued at the last session, to revise and fix the pay of the officers of the two Houses, and had ordered that Messrs. Fessenden, Sherman, and Buckalew be the committee on the part of the Senate.

The message further announced that the Senate had concurred in the resolution of the House relating to the adjournment of Congress from the 21st of December to the 5th of January next.

ENGLISH SCHOONER SYBIL.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit a copy of a note of the 24th of November last, addressed to the Secretary of State by the minister of Great Britain, communicating a decree of the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York, ordering the payment of certain sums to the defendants in a suit against the English schooner Sybil, libeled as a prize of war. It is requisite for a fulfillment of the decree that an appropriation of the sums specified therein should be made by Congress. The appropriation is recommended accordingly.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, December 8, 1868.

ALABAMA CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

In answer to the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 7th instant, relating to the correspondence with the American minister at London concerning the so-called Alabama claims, I transmit a report on the subject from the Secretary of State.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, December 11, 1868.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE. WASHINGTON, December 11, 1868.

To the President:

The Secretary of State, to whom was referred the resolution of the House of Representatives of December 7, 1868, in the following words:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to this House, if not incompatible with the public interest, copies of the letter of instructions to the American minister at London relating to the settlement of the so-called Alabama claims, and any subsequent correspondence with him or the British Government on that subject.

Has the honor to submit the following report:

In his annual message transmitted on the 9th of December, after the resolution referred to was passed, the President informed Congress that negotiations upon the subject referred to in the resolution, with some other international controversies between the United States and Great Britain were pending, and that he was not without hope of being able to lay before the Senate, for its consideration during the present session, protocols calculated to bring those controversies to an end.

The negotiations to which the President thus referred have just now been arrested by the retirement of her Majesty's late ministers from administration. There is reason, however, to believe that the interruption will be only a temporary one. Under these circumstances the Secretary of State is of opinion that the publication of the correspondence called for at the present moment would be premature and incompatible with the public interests.

Respectfully submitted:

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

On motion of Mr. WOOD, the message and accompanying paper were referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered to be printed.

WASHINGTON AND NEW YORK RAILROAD.

Mr. LYNCH obtained the floor, but yielded to Mr. COOK, who moved that the bill (H. R. No. 621) authorizing the building of a military and postal railroad from Washington, District of Columbia, to the city of New York be printed with the amendments, and recommended to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

By unanimous consent it was so ordered.

Mr. COOK moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GENERAL JOSEPH J. REYNOLDS.

Mr. ORTH, by unanimous consent, introduced the following joint resolution (H. R. No. 385;) which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That the thanks of Congress are hereby tendered to Brevet Major General Joseph J. Reynolds, for his ability and impartiality in the discharge of the delicate and important duty devolved upon him as commander of the fifth military district of the United States.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1546) to enforce the laws of the United States in the State of Georgia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Reconstruction, and ordered to be printed.

PAY OFFICERS IN THE NAVY.

Mr. LYNCH. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY.]

Mr. FERRY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1547) to establish the rank of pay officers of the Navy; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REFUNDING OF TAXES.

Mr. LYNCH. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.]

Mr. RANDALL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1548) to regulate the refunding of taxes paid into the Treasury; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LYNCH. I yield next to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.]

SOUTH AMERICAN SQUADRON.

Mr. HOLMAN, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State, if not incompatible with the public interest, communicate to this House all the correspondence in his Department between Hon. J. Watson Webb, American minister at Brazil, and Rear Admiral Davis touching the disposition of the American squadron at Rio Janeiro and the Paraguay difficulties.

Mr. BROOKS. I must object to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. Lynch] yielding any further. Unless I can drive some sort of bargain with gentlemen who want to do business I object to everything.

Mr. UPSON. I move to reconsider the several votes by which bills have been referred, and to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. BROOKS. I object. I call for a separate vote.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Oh, let that go.

Mr. BROOKS. Well, I yield to the father of the House, and will let it go. [Laughter.]

The motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. BROOKS. I now call for the regular order.

RESUMPTION OF SPECIE PAYMENTS.

Mr. LYNCH. I should be happy to accommodate other gentlemen, but the gentleman from New York objects. I desire to ask the unanimous consent of the House to allow the bill (H. R. No. 1364) to provide for the gradual resumption of specie payments, which was reported by me from the Committee on Banking and Currency and made the special order for the second Tuesday in December, to be made the special order for the first Tuesday in January.

I wish to make this statement: the bill was made the special order for the second Tuesday in December, and the second Tuesday in December was the second day of the session. I was under a misapprehension, supposing that it would be the second Tuesday of the session. I simply want to correct the mistake, and have that bill, which was by unanimous consent made the special order for the second Tuesday in December, made the special order for the first Tuesday in January, and from day to day until disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read from the Calendar, so as to show the position of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Mr. LYNCH—Banking and Currency—A bill (H. R. No. 1364) to provide for the gradual resumption of specie payments. Its further consideration postponed until the second Tuesday in December next, after the morning hour. Made a special order for that time."

The SPEAKER. The second Tuesday in December having been the second day of the session, the gentleman from Maine states that it was overlooked.

Mr. LYNCH. I think the Speaker was laboring under the same mistake as well as many gentlemen of the House. We supposed that next Tuesday was the second Tuesday in December.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Maine?

Mr. SCHENCK. I object.

Mr. LYNCH. I move, then, to suspend the rules, in order to allow a correction of the error into which I fell.

Mr. SCHENCK. I object to making it a special order for so early a day.

Mr. MAYNARD. I rise to a question of order. This bill was made the special order for the second Tuesday in December. I submit, as a point of order, that that means the second congressional Tuesday, and not the second calendar Tuesday. To-morrow will be the second congressional Tuesday in the month, and the bill stands as the special order for to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. It is contrary to the uniform usage of the House. Bills are often made the special order for the second or third Thursday in December, for instance. If that does not mean the second or third Thursday in December, as it will be found in the almanac, Speakers have very generally labored under a mistake and have called up bills on the wrong day.

Mr. SCHENCK. I suggest to the gentleman that he make the bill the special order for the third Tuesday in January.

Mr. LYNCH. I will modify my motion so as to make it the special order for the first Wednesday in January.

Mr. SCHENCK. That is no better than the other. I propose to the gentleman to make it the third Tuesday, which I will not oppose. That will allow other reports upon the same subject to be submitted to the House.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman will modify his motion so that it will be made the special order for the day only. To make it the special order from day to day may take a week.

Mr. LYNCH. I must insist upon my motion.

The question was then taken upon the motion of Mr. LYNCH, as modified; and upon a division there were—ayes 98, noes 33.

So (two thirds voting in the affirmative) the rules were suspended; and the bill (H. R. No. 1364) was made the special order for the first Wednesday in January next after the morning hour, and from day to day until disposed of.

PURCHASE OF ALASKA.

Mr. WOOD. I move that the rules be suspended, in order to allow the following preamble and resolution to be introduced and agreed to:

Whereas the Worcester Spy, edited and conducted by a member of this House, recently published the following statement: "Of the $7,220,000 in gold voted for Alaska, the amount it is now reported Russia actually got was $5,000,000 in gold, about one million pounds sterling. This leaves $2,200,000 to be accounted for. But with regard to the outside ring, the third house—the press, editors, and correspondents—it is reported that above three hundred thousand dollars in greenbacks was spent among them. Mr. Riggs, a banker here, is said to have obtained from the Secretary of the Treasury, just at the close of the debates, &c., which terminated by the purchase of Alaska, a loan of the amount just specified. That loan was—if it had any real existence—for obvious reasons, never made public. Immediately on the receipt by Mr. Riggs, newspaper men and others known as lobbyists were the owners of drafts of various amounts on the Treasurer of the United States, which it is declared General Spinner's books will show were cashed. Among the sums specified in these reports are such items as New York Tribune, $3,000; manager of its Washington bureau, $5,000; publisher of Washington Chronicle, $25,000. The correspondent of the Times, World, Boston Journal, Philadelphia Press, Chicago Tribune, Boston Advertiser, Evening Post, and others are all put down as having been paid various sums each, from $2,500 upward. Some of them are anxiously inquiring what has become of the money, as it has never been paid to them. The daughters of a member from Ohio got $10,000 each; but this, it is affirmed, was immediately sent back. Robert J. Walker got $25,000 in gold. The certificates for this amount were, I believe, stolen from him in Boston or New York. He says it was a professional retainer from the Russian Government. He appears also to have been acting professionally for his own Government, as some part of the Riggs $300,000 appears to have passed into his hands; and whereas these declarations, if true, seriously affect the character of our Government, and if not true the parties accused should have an opportunity to prove their innocence: Therefore

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Public Expenditures be directed to institute a full investigation into the truth of these allegations, with power to send for persons and papers, and to report at any time.

The question was then taken; and two-thirds voting in the affirmative the rules were suspended, and the preamble and resolution received and agreed to.

NIAGARA SHIP-CANAL.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution for consideration at this time:

Resolved, That the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of House bill No. 1202, to provide for the construction of a ship-canal around the Falls of Niagara, and that the same be made the special order for consideration in the House on the second Tuesday of January next after the morning hour, and so continued until disposed of.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I object.

Mr. RANDALL. This bill involves the expenditure of only about twelve million dollars.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. Then I move that the rules be suspended to allow my resolution to be introduced and agreed to.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 77, noes 41.

Before the result was announced,

Mr. JUDD called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 103, nays 41; not voting 71; as follows:

COMMISSIONER TO SPAIN.

Mr. HUNTER. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to inform this House whether any commissioner has recently been sent as a representative of this country to Spain; and if so, for what purpose and by what authority; the name of said commissioner, the amount of compensation to be allowed him, and out of what fund paid, and also a copy of any instructions given to said commissioner.

Mr. CHANLER. I object.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to suspend the rules, that the resolution may be introduced and agreed to.

On the motion there were—ayes 79, noes 34.

Mr. CHANLER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So (two thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended, and the resolution of Mr. HUNTER was introduced and agreed to.

BRIDGES ACROSS THE OHIO RIVER.

Mr. COOK. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution, by direction of the Committee on Roads and Canals:

Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals shall have power to examine upon oath such skilled and scientific witnesses as they may deem necessary upon the bill referred to said committee in relation to the building of bridges across the Ohio river, provided the same shall be done without expense of mileage for officers or witnesses.

There being no objection the resolution was considered and agreed to.

TRADE WITH SPANISH WEST INDIA ISLANDS.

Mr. LYNCH, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas vessels of the United States are, in ports of the Spanish West India islands, subjected to discriminating tonnage duties and port charges, amounting to nearly double the rates charged to vessels of Great Britain and some other European nations; and whereas the commerce between the United States and said islands is very extensive and of great importance: Therefore

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be directed to inquire and report to this House what action should be taken by our Government to place vessels of the United States landing at said ports on an equal footing with those of the most favored nations.

RESTRICTION OF FRANKING PRIVILEGE.

Mr. FARNSWORTH, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1549) to restrict and regulate the franking privilege; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope that the bill will be read, and I think it would meet the approbation of the House to pass it now.

Several MEMBERS objected.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move the reference of the bill to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

The motion was agreed to.

COURTS IN CHARLESTON, SOUTH CAROLINA.

Mr. WHITTEMORE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, December 15, 1868.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Hon. JACOB M. HOWARD, of Michigan, appeared in his seat to-day.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, recommending an appropriation for the purchase or rent of a building for the accommodation of the clerical force in the offices of the Commissioner of Pensions and Commissioner of Patents; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the memorial of a committee of Indiana yearly meeting of Friends, praying that a certain piece of land granted to the Indiana yearly meeting of Friends for school purposes by the Shawnee Indians may be confirmed to them; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. WILSON. I present the memorial of the executive committee of the American Missionary Association, signed by George Whipple and M. E. Strieby, secretaries, and Edgar Ketchum, treasurer, in which they set forth that they have for seven years been engaged in sending physical supplies, schools, and religious teachers to the South; that the missionaries and teachers of the association have averaged for the last two years more than five hundred in number; that they were devoted solely to the work of relieving and educating the people without respect to race or color; and for the very reason that their labors are thus impartial they are exposed to the violence of the disloyal, their work hindered, their schools sometimes broken up, and themselves subjected to insults and danger. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and be printed, as it contains an important statement of facts and tables.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY presented the petition of Lieutenant Commander J. N. Quackenbush, United States Navy, praying to be restored to the active list; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. DOOLITTLE presented the memorial of William Cornell Jewett, praying Congress to withhold all subsidy in United States bonds, money, or lands from the Pacific Railroad Company until the present road is made complete and safe by proper bridges and necessary work, and until the company shall give ample security not to abandon the road to the Government on finding it a failure, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

Mr. POMEROY presented a petition of women of Massachusetts, praying that in any amendment to the Constitution to extend or regulate suffrage there be no distinction made between men and women; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Michigan, praying that in any amendment to the Constitution to extend or regulate suffrage there be no distinction made between men and women; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WHYTE presented the memorial of James P. Ellicott, praying that in the event of the passage of a law repaving Pennsylvania avenue his patent street washer and irrigator may be adopted; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire, presented a report of receipts and expenditures of the Columbia Institution for the Deaf and Dumb from June, 1857, to July 1, 1868; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SUMNER, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 178) tendering sympathy and best wishes to the people of Spain, reported it with amendments.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom were referred the following petitions and memorials, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to:

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the claim of A. Burwell, and that the petitioner have leave to withdraw his petition and papers.

NATIONAL DEBT.

Mr. CATTELL. The Committee on Finance, to whom were referred the three resolutions offered yesterday in reference to that portion of the President's message which treats of the public debt, have instructed me to report back the resolution offered by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. WILLEY] without amendment, and to ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires unanimous consent. The Senator from New Jersey asks for the present consideration of the resolution reported by him. Is there any objection?

Mr. McCREERY. I object to the present consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, it goes over under the rule.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. NYE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 689) to provide for the paving of a portion of Pennsylvania avenue and Fifteenth street west, in the city of Washington, District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 690) to incorporate the Washington Insurance Company of Washington, District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. EDMUNDS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 691) to prevent the holding of civil offices by military officers, and to prevent the holding of more than one office at the same time; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SUMNER. I will inquire of my friend whether that is not already anticipated by a section in one of our appropriation bills last year?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think it is not fully; at least I desire to have the subject investigated and see if we cannot stop the double holding of offices.

Mr. SUMNER. There is a section in one of our appropriation bills providing that no military or naval officer shall hold at the same time a civil and a military office.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to the reference of the bill? None being made, it will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

CLAIMS AGAINST VENEZUELA.

Mr. SUMNER submitted the following resolution; which was considered, by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, if in his judgment not incompatible with the public interest, to communicate to the Senate any information in his possession in reference to the action of the mixed commission for the adjustment of claims by the citizens of the United States against the Government of Venezuela.

TERRITORY OF ALASKA.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to communicate to the Senate all information possessed by the Treasury Department, not already communicated, respecting the territory of Alaska, and particularly concerning the fur interests therein.

POLITICAL DISABILITIES IN SOUTHERN STATES.

Mr. FERRY. Mr. President, I move to take from the table the bill introduced yesterday by the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. STEWART,] to punish the crime of holding office in violation of the fourteenth article of the Constitution. It is Senate bill No. 677. At the time of the introduction of the bill I requested the Senator from Nevada to let it lie on the table until to-day before referring it, promising to call it up and move its reference to-day, and desiring at the same time, with the consent of the Senate, on the motion to refer, to submit some remarks upon the bill and the bills introduced by myself at the commencement of the session. I therefore move that the bill offered by the Senator from Nevada be now taken from the table for that purpose.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 677) to punish the crime of holding office in violation of the fourteenth article of the Constitution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That any person who shall hereafter accept or hold an office to which he is ineligible under the third section of the fourteenth article of the Constitution of the United States, or who shall attempt to hold or exercise the duties of such office, shall be deemed guilty of a felony against the United States, and upon conviction thereof shall be imprisoned not less than three years nor more than ten, and fined not less than $1,000 nor more than $10,000.

Mr. FERRY. Mr. President, the bill just read, and which was introduced by the Senator from Nevada on yesterday, provides a system of penalties for the purpose of enforcing the disabilities provided by the third section of the fourteenth article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Early in the session I had the honor to introduce two measures whose combined operation would secure the removal of all political disabilities growing out of Federal legislation during the progress of reconstruction. Those bills were appropriately referred at the time of their introduction; and I should not have attempted to discuss them until the action of the committee upon them had been made known to the Senate had it not been that the introduction of this bill by the Senator from Nevada affords me an opportunity and strengthens the argument in favor of the measures which I have proposed. In order that those measures may be understood, both separately and in combination, I desire that they shall be read by the Secretary. I send to the desk, for that purpose, Senate resolution No. 184.

The Chief Clerk read the joint resolution (S.

R. No. 184) for the removal of political disabilities, as follows:

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two thirds of both Houses concurring.) That all persons now disqualified to hold office by the third section of the fourteenth article of amendment of the Constitution of the United States are hereby relieved from such disability, and the same is removed from and after the passage of this joint resolution.

Mr. FERRY. I now send to the desk to be read Senate bill No. 656.

The Chief Clerk read the bill (S. No. 656) to remove political disabilities, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all such parts of any act or acts of Congress as forbid any citizen of the United States to vote at any election, by reason of any of the disabilities mentioned in the third section of the fourteenth article of amendment of the Constitution of the United States, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. FERRY. I would have been better pleased could I have embraced the whole subject-matter in one bill; but as in order to remove the disabilities enumerated in the third section of the fourteenth amendment it is necessary to obtain a concurring vote of two thirds of both Houses, it became also necessary that separate measures should be introduced for the removal of those disabilities on the one hand, and for the abolition of the limitations upon the suffrage imposed by the reconstruction laws on the other. The joint resolution seeks to restore to eligibility to office all citizens of the United States who have lost it by reason of the adoption of the fourteenth article of amendments to the Constitution of the United States. The bill seeks to remove the restrictions upon the suffrage which were imposed by certain acts of Congress known as the reconstruction laws. So that the two together will, as I have said, if adopted by Congress, operate to remove all political disabilities which have been created by Federal legislation during the progress of reconstruction. They interfere in no wise with State action, leaving the local policies of the States to their own discretion. It is my earnest hope that both these measures may meet with the sanction of Congress during the present session, and I have introduced them thus early, and take the opportunity of making these remarks, in order that the matter may be brought directly to the consideration of the Senate.

I may remark, Mr. President, in the first place, as one reason why these disabilities should be removed, that in their origin they were intended by Congress to be only temporary. The third section of the fourteenth amendment provides upon its face that the disabilities imposed thereby may be at any time removed by a vote of two thirds of both Houses of Congress. The limitations of the suffrage in the reconstruction acts are by their very terms confined to the transition period between the cessation of arms and the full restoration of the Union. That the latter were thus intended to be temporary is evident from the acts themselves. That the former was proposed to the people with the same intention appears both from the debates in Congress at that time and from the language of the amendment itself. For the purpose of rendering this clear I beg leave to read a brief extract from the debates in the Senate on the 30th of May, 1866, when this third section was under consideration. The Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SUMNER,] in commenting upon the section, remarks:

"But I take it all of us understand the meaning of the third section. It is that, for a time at least, all who have violated not only the letter, but the spirit of the oath of office they took when they became officers of the United States, and took the oath to support the Constitution of the United States, shall not hold office until a state of affairs shall come when two thirds of both Houses may, by a general amnesty, wipe out all these disabilities."

And this general understanding thus referred to by the Senator from Ohio is clearly evident throughout the whole of those debates. The question, therefore, arises whether the time has come for "wiping out all these disabilities." I take it, in the first place, in reference to the disabilities imposed by the third section of the fourteenth article of amendment, that when the necessity for the existence of those disabilities shall have passed away Congress and the people of the United States will desire that the disabilities themselves shall be removed. In order to ascertain whether the time has now arrived when it can be truly said that that necessity has passed away, it may be well for us to inquire into the original necessity of any such amendment to the Constitution at all, and for this purpose it is well to examine the history of the fourteenth amendment; to consider the time at which it was prepared and promulgated to the people, and the circumstances which surrounded it.

It was prepared at the first session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and for the purpose of bringing about a more speedy restoration of the Union. It was prepared on account of the fact that the influential class in the southern communities, composing the great slave-holding and land-holding interest, and which included, also, the holders of office there for a generation before the war, had, it was believed, led the masses of those communities away from their allegiance to the General Government into insurrection and rebellion against the authority of the nation. It was believed that it was necessary to emancipate the southern masses from the influence and control of this oligarchy which had ruled them, and that by taking away that influence and control the masses themselves would return to loyal allegiance to the Government, and communities be built up there which could be safely intrusted with the resumption of the functions of States in the Federal Union. So that the great object of the third section of the amendment was the emancipation of the masses of the voting population of the South from the control of the oligarchy which was believed to be mainly responsible for the rebellion.

At that time, it must be remembered, during the first session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, the idea had not yet entered into the minds of the majority of our statesmen that a loyal element was to be developed in the southern States by enfranchising the colored population. The whole theory of the fourteenth amendment, during the first session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, was that under the operation of the amendment the political power of those communities was to remain in the old voting or white population, except so far as they should, by their own action, consent to share it with the colored citizens; and hence the necessity of emancipating the masses of the white population from the control of those who had led them into insurrection.

As such, as a measure necessary at the time for building up loyal communities in the recent theater of rebellion and for speedily bringing those communities back to the exercise of their normal functions in the Union, the people acquiesced in and sanctioned this third section of the fourteenth amendment. Now, sir, since that period almost three years have elapsed; and the inquiry to-day is whether the necessity which then existed for such disabilities exists any longer? If that necessity has ceased, if the restoration of the Union which was sought for by this species of legislation is now substantially an accomplished fact, then certainly it would seem that the time has arrived, foreseen by the Senator from Ohio, when by one general law we may wipe out all those disabilities.

Now, sir, has not that period arrived? Events have occurred stronger than all your legislation, more potent than all constitutional amendments which you have enacted or can enact to secure the immediate and complete restoration of the integrity of the Republic. The verdict of the people in the recent election has rendered no longer doubtful the immediate and complete return of all the States to their proper relations in the Union. Seven of them already have returned, and I see their loyal Senators around me on this floor. The remaining three inevitably, in the ordinary progress of events, must come back before another year has passed over our heads. The necessity having ceased the disabilities should be removed.

When we come to the consideration of the abolition of the restrictions upon suffrage we are led into a somewhat similar course of inquiry to that through which we have just passed. How came it to be necessary to limit the suffrage in these southern States in the manner in which it is limited by the reconstruction acts? The fourteenth article of amendment had been promulgated to the people in June, 1866, and in the autumn and winter following had been quite unanimously rejected by the provisional Legislatures of the southern States. I shall not stop here to inquire how it happened that the rejection took place.

It is enough to say that it is clearly traceable to a combination between the southern oligarchy, the President of the United States, and the leaders of the Democratic party at the North. But the rejection did take place; and when the Thirty-Ninth Congress assembled at its second session the whole work of reconstruction had to begin again from the foundation, and now experience had taught us that the work would not stand unless it was founded upon justice. We had realized the necessity of developing in some other mode in those southern communities a loyal element, out of which State organizations might be framed which could be safely intrusted with the resumption of Federal duties. Hence the franchise was extended to the colored citizens of the South. But while at the same time the necessity of developing and building up a loyal element had become apparent, it had also become apparent that it was necessary to put down still more effectually the political power of the controlling disloyal element there; and therefore, for the transition period which must yet elapse before the restoration of those States to the Union, Congress in the reconstruction laws provided that the classes enumerated in the third section of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution should not be permitted to vote, limiting and confining the operation of the provision to the transition period of which I have spoken.

In seven of the States the laws themselves have been replaced by the local State constitutions. They apply now only to Texas, Virginia, and Mississippi; and they apply there, after the result of the recent election, after the conviction which must have been forced upon the mind of every citizen of those States by that election of the inevitable necessity of a return to a loyal submission to the Government of the United States. These laws, limiting and restraining the suffrage, serve now only to gall and irritate, and to do no good whatever, unless, indeed, sir—that which I too often hear and too often read in the newspapers—we are here to continue disabilities upon those people for the purpose of maintaining the ascendancy of the Republican party in those communities; and I take it that legislation for such a purpose as that, or for any merely partisan purpose, is not to be entertained by the Senate of the United States.

Well, now, sir, is there any necessity that the fragment that remains of the operation of these limitations upon the suffrage in those States should be longer continued? And if there is not; if the original necessity of these disabilities of both kinds has passed away, has actually been driven out of existence by the action of the people of the United States in the recent presidential election, why should we retain them here longer?

But, sir, is not the only reason for the removal of these disabilities that the necessity in which they originated has passed away. There are other and stronger reasons affirmatively why the Congress of the United States should now enact the measures which I have introduced.

In the first place, if we are to judge by public action, what is the sentiment of the people in these restored States themselves? You limited the suffrage throughout those States during the transition period; and when the people came to make their new constitutions, your own friends, the very loyal element that you had built up, swept away by their sovereign action in their conventions the very limitations that you had imposed.

But that is not all. The local feeling is not only thus evinced, but the continuance of these disabilities now provided for in the third section of the fourteenth article is injurious to the interests and the safety of the whole Republic. What do we want of those States? We want them to come back to build up a strong, free, and enduring nationality; and it is true, Senators; that the disabilities imposed by this third section to-day deprive the States and the Republic of the assistance and services of the greater portion of the intelligence, the culture, and the property of those communities.

Is it said that it is dangerous now, after the action of the people of this country in the recent presidential election? I do not believe that there is a man so mad throughout that whole portion of the Republic as even to wish to struggle longer against the national supremacy; and if he entertain no such wish, what other wish can he entertain except to restore prosperity to his own and all portions of the country?

But the imposition of your disabilities goes further. It scatters broadcast all over the South a race of political outlaws, sullen and discontented, from the feeling, right or wrong, that they are suffering injustice; and naturally enough so fits them to become centers of conspiracy.

The continuance of the disabilities affects not only the individuals themselves, but it extends to the whole community. It is a disfranchisement, so far as it goes, of every citizen there, black and white, loyal and disloyal. It is not enough to say to me "You may go to the polls to vote" when, at the same time, you say to me, "The man you choose shall not hold his office;" and thus the operation of the disabilities, if continued, will not only be to foster discontent in the class immediately affected by them, but it spreads the discontent out into the masses of society. And what is it that we want now? What is it that was the great watchword that carried us triumphantly, more, perhaps, than anything else, through the recent contest? It was the aching, longing demand of the people of this nation for peace; peace at home; peace with each other; peace with all the people in every State; peace, the parent of law, of order, of industry, and of prosperity. And are you to get peace by refusing to permit great bodies of citizens in ten of the States of the Union; yea, in all the States, wherever they may happen to reside, to be eligible to office, and by forbidding their fellow-citizens to exercise the right of suffrage in voting for them?

The bill of the Senator from Nevada is a forcible commentary upon the impolicy of any longer continuing in existence these disabilities. What is that bill? A bill for the creation of new crimes; a bill for the imposition of new punishments, fines, and imprisonments by Federal courts and Federal authority and Federal officers upon persons whom the people, in the exercise of their right of suffrage, according to their good pleasure, have elected to office.

And the bill of the Senator from Nevada is a logical deduction from the continuance of these disabilities, because if you insist upon continuing them you must do one of two things; you must either enforce them or you must let them pass without enforcement. If you enforce them you employ the central power of this nation and send it perambulating every State to see how the people vote and who holds the local offices. You drag constables and sheriffs and justices of the peace and members of the Legislatures before your Federal courts because they have accepted the offices to which the people chose them. You inflict upon them fines and imprisonments. You centralize the entire power of this Government. Sir, I am no particular believer in, nor have I any particular respect for, what is called the doctrine of State rights; but I do believe that, essential to our republican system, essential to the liberties of this people, is the continuance of local self-government, and the bill of the Senator from Nevada compels the Federal authority to interfere in every local election throughout the Republic wherever the people shall choose to select for office a person affected by any of these disabilities. But suppose, on the other hand, that you do not enforce the law; that the bill of the Senator from Nevada shall not pass, and that the constitutional amendment shall be left to stand to enforce itself, then, as we know from experience, it will not be enforced. In every one of the recently reconstructed States, States that have made republican constitutions and sent them here, and we have approved them, in different parts of those States the local constituencies have chosen public officers obnoxious to some of these disabilities.

Will you enforce your law? You centralize the Government and you strike a fatal blow at the existence of local self-government, the proper foundation of our republican system. Will you decline or neglect to enforce your law? You bring all law into contempt. So that in either point of view it is true, as I said, that the bill offered by the Senator from Nevada is a forcible argument in favor of the measures which I advocate.

Again, sir, now that the strife of civil war is over; now that the three years of anarchy which a bad President has brought upon us are brought to a close; now that the people have by such overwhelming majorities declared that this Government henceforth is to go back to the system which Jefferson contemplated when he framed the Declaration, it is needful for the building up of that homogeneous state of civil society all over the Republic which is essential to the continuance of our institutions, that these disabilities should be removed. I have felt rejoiced at the amendment after amendment to the Constitution which has been offered in the two Houses of Congress at this session for the abolition of the class distinctions which still disfigure the legislation of many of the States of this Union. I have always believed that our Republican system can only endure upon the basis of a true and broad democracy, a Government deriving its powers from the consent of the governed. And how can I stand here and vote for an amendment to the Constitution to strike out all distinctions of color in the exercise of the suffrage and at the same time insist upon the continuance of such disabilities as yet remain upon the Federal statute-book? Why, sir, it does seem to me as if the experience of the last fifty years ought to enlighten us as to the chimerical character of the dangers which have been apprehended from the extension of suffrage and of eligibility to office at one time and another.

It has been thought once, even in this land, that poverty disqualified a man from voting, and no man, unless he was the owner of property, was permitted to exercise the suffrage. Time went on; the property qualification disappeared; and nowhere are law and order more respected, are person and property more secure than in those communities where suffrage is most universal and government rests upon the broadest foundation.

It has been thought that dangers might assail us in the influx of the enormous immigration from the Old World, and a great party was once organized upon that very apprehension. The fear has passed away, for time and experience have demonstrated that the evils accompanying that immigration are but temporary, and will pass away in a single generation.

The time has been when the negro was a beast of burden, and nothing else. The time is now when good men too often apprehend the danger of an extension of the suffrage unto him by reason of the ignorance which is the result of centuries of slavery; but it is beginning to be seen, by the practical operation of the laws extending suffrage, that all these fears are chimerical, and that the black man as well as the white is an element of strength and prosperity in civil society.

And so now other good men fear that the extension of the suffrage and the removal of the disabilities to and from the entire class lately engaged in the rebellion will bring peril to the community. The apprehension in the last case, in my judgment, will prove as fallacious as in all the other cases; and I think that with the adoption of some one of the constitutional amendments to which I have referred, with the sweeping away from your statute-book of all these disabilities, we may realize in a brief space of time that which Jefferson contemplated when he framed the Declaration—a government wherein rich and poor, native and citizen of foreign birth, the negro and his former master, may all constitute elements in a republican democracy, which shall be as broad as the continent, and as enduring as the national life.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I introduced this bill yesterday for the purpose of reference, but it was laid over in order that the Senator from Connecticut might make some remarks upon it. In order that those remarks may not go out without a brief statement of the situation, I desire to make a few observations myself on the same subject.

There is no one more ready to remove disabilities than myself, and no one more anxious for an opportunity to remove disabilities; but in removing disabilities I want reciprocity on the part of those people. That has been my theory from the beginning. If their disabilities are to be removed, if they are to be restored to citizenship and to the right to hold office, I want them voluntarily to allow other citizens the same privilege.

This particular section of the constitutional amendment when it was adopted was intended, as stated by the Senator from Connecticut, to be temporary. I thought at that time I saw some virtue in the section. I saw that there would be a time when we could appeal to the men in the South who had control to a great extent there to grant civil and political rights to all men, and receive them themselves. This subject of the removal of disabilities has been referred to me in the Senate, for the most part, and I have examined each case with all the care that I could, and wherever I found a person willing to submit to the laws of Congress, wherever the evidence tended to show that he was disposed to submit to the laws of Congress, to make no more trouble and cease to ostracize others, I have recommended the removal of the disabilities. It is reported that some of those very persons whose disabilities have been removed have not acted as they professed on that occasion, but for the most part they have acted well. There have been some mistakes already made.

The condition of the southern country will not warrant—I hope the time may come very soon when it will—the removal of disabilities universally. If we intend to secure what the Senator is so anxious to secure, that is to secure to all men their just rights, to wipe out class legislation and to make this a democratic Republic, it will not do to place any more power in the hands of the enemies of those ideas. Where they have had power they have exercised it in the most arbitrary manner in the South. In Georgia, for instance, we find them without any cause expelling from office without any trial loyal men elected and holding their offices, not only in accordance with the laws of Congress but in accordance with their State constitution, on account of color. We find them perpetrating those acts, and among the number guilty of these outrages we are informed—it has not been investigated; it is to be investigated, however—that there are a large number of persons who are disqualified from holding office under this very fourteenth amendment. Will the Senator from Connecticut remove the disabilities from those men who are disqualified by law, while they, in violation of all law and against their own local law, expel members of the Legislature?

Whenever we can have reciprocity, whenever these people are willing to allow their neighbors to enjoy civil and political rights, as they are entitled to do under the Constitution and laws of their country, I am willing to forget their crime of rebellion, notwithstanding it has caused so much misery to this country, and I am willing that they shall be restored, but not until then. Not until they will do justice to others shall they receive mercy at my hands as a Senator here:

We find in the city of New Orleans another striking example of the tyranny of these men. There are in that city forty-one thousand registered votes. It is stated, however, that there are five or six thousand illegally naturalized persons there who should not be counted in that number, making it something less. There were twenty-three thousand votes polled there at the presidential election, and out of that number there were but two hundred and seventy-six Republican votes. This, of course, is hereafter to be investigated, and I only make these statements upon the information I get; but all the parties with whom I have conversed estimate that there are twenty thousand Republicans in that city. They state, whether truly or falsely, as the reason why they did not vote, that there was so much violence, such a reign of terror, that it was impossible for them to go to the polls. This violence was perpetrated by the very men who are disqualified under the fourteenth article. Before we proceed to remove disabilities we should investigate this matter at New Orleans and see if it be true, as alleged, that the late rebels excluded from the polls their political opponents by violence. If they did not, if they are willing that the laws shall be enforced, if they are willing that all men shall enjoy the rights to which they are entitled under the Constitution, there is nobody inclined to continue these disabilities; but, until that is done, let it be understood that the laws of Congress must be respected. If while they thus defy the laws we repeal them, it will look like an act of cowardice. When they are willing to submit to the laws and be good citizens and give us evidence of that fact, then it will be generosity on our part to repeal them; but let us not repeal them nor extend any generosity toward them while they are threatening the lives of our friends and the peace of this country. They must obey the laws. I am willing that all men who will obey the laws and be good citizens shall be relieved; and I think that is the position which the committee will hold. So far as I am concerned hereafter, if I have anything to do with the subject of relieving from disabilities, I shall examine each case most critically, and I must be satisfied that the person asking to have disabilities removed has done some works meet for repentance, and that he is willing to be a good citizen. Then I shall be disposed to advocate the removal of his disabilities, but not until then.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The question is on the motion to refer this bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

MILITIA IN THE SOUTHERN STATES.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up Senate bill No. 665.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I gave notice, on Thursday last, that I should to-day move to discharge the Committee on Finance from the consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 66, touching the faith of the nation on the subject of the payment of its funded debt. I am informed by the chairman of that committee that the committee are not quite ready to report upon the subject, but will report to-morrow. In that state of the case, I shall of course have no occasion to make that precise motion, and shall postpone proposing what I wish to have the Senate do until to-morrow. I have thought it fit to say this, inasmuch as otherwise it might be inferred that I had given up the idea of getting the sense of the Senate upon that important question; but as that committee will report to-morrow, I shall not press my motion at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON.]

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 665) to repeal section six of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1868," approved March 2, 1867.

The Committee on Military Affairs reported the bill with an amendment to strike out all of the original bill after the enacting clause, in the following words:

That section six of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1867, is hereby repealed.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

That so much of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1867, as prohibits the organization, arming, or calling into service of the militia forces in the States lately in rebellion, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I should like to inquire what that section is?

Mr. WILSON. By the act of March 2, 1867, Congress forbade the unreconstructed States from organizing militia. Most of those States have been reconstructed since that time, and it was proposed at the last session of Congress to repeal the act in order to allow those States to organize their militia. The President of the United States in his message earnestly recommends this repeal now. I do not know that anybody opposed it here at the last session; but I think it fell between the two Houses. I hope this bill will be promptly passed, because I believe some of these Legislatures are in session now, and are very desirous of legislating on the subject before they adjourn, as they may do in a very brief time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have my friend, the chairman of the Military Committee, inform us what is the propriety of repealing the law which prohibits the three States that have not been readmitted into the Union, Virginia, Texas, and Mississippi, from organizing a militia? They have failed to comply with the reconstruction acts, as we have some reason to suppose, somewhat in a spirit of hostility to the policy which Congress has adopted. I might say something more than "somewhat in a spirit of hostility," probably, and not get beyond the truth. Now, the question is whether, as applied to those States, it is wise to take the hand of Congress off from them and to permit those communities, which are yet in a state of rebellion and who are held under the authority of military law, to set up a local militia of their own. I should be somewhat afraid, in such a case as that, that the loyal men who exist in those communities, men who desire peace, who wish to pursue industry, to acquire property, and to reestablish themselves, both black and white, would find it rather hard times under an organization of militia in those States at this period. I suggest to my friend, therefore, the inquiry whether it would not be wise to except those three States from the operation of this repealing act, if the original act which this proposes to repeal prohibited these local military organizations not only in the States that have been readmitted to Congress, but also in the States of Virginia, Mississippi, and Texas? With that exception I should be entirely satisfied, I think, with the bill. I suggest to my friend whether it would not be wiser to leave those States as they are?

Mr. WILSON. If that be the will of the Senate I shall not oppose it; but as those three States have no Legislatures to be called together, and cannot legislate on the subject, and have constitutions made which will probably be adopted in the course of a few months, I thought it better to make a whole thing of it at once and have it all settled. If, however, the Senator or Senators desire that the bill shall not apply to those States, I am not strenuous about it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the amendment by inserting as a proviso:

Provided, That this act shall not operate to repeal so much of the act aforesaid as relates to the States of Virginia, Mississippi, and Texas.

That will accomplish my object; and I think it wise not to leap before we come to the stile. The existing act prohibits military organizations, and it does not necessarily, in the irregular way that things are done down there, require a formal and regular State government to authorize a military or militia organization; and I should expect, with the temper that we have seen exhibited in some of those States, particularly in Texas, where a reign of terror exists in almost all the counties, in spite of the few troops we have there now, that in that State military organizations adverse to liberty, adverse to peace and good order in society would immediately spring into existence, and would be used to the detriment of the progress of affairs in that region. I hope, therefore, that we shall pursue what appears to me to be the prudent course, of holding this prohibition against those States which have refused to comply with the conditions that we have imposed upon the others.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not now recollect what were the considerations that were urged upon the Senate for the adoption of the section which it is proposed by this bill to repeal. If the action of Congress at that time were wise, I am not aware of anything in our history since that time which makes its repeal now proper or important. Certainly the recent transactions in some of the States do not establish that the use of the local military power for the government of the people has been useful. On the contrary, much evidence is before the country that great wrongs and outrages are perpetrated by the local militia, and if this country is to be governed by military power I prefer that it should be governed by the regular Army of the United States—a military power that is under some control.

The calling up of the bill at this time would seem to be an indorsement of some of the conduct of the military companies in some of the southern States. Is it to be an indorsement of the transactions that have recently illustrated the sort of government that now obtains in the State of Arkansas? Is it to be an indorsement of the policy that has prevailed and governed society and governed elections for the last year or two in the State of Tennessee? Are the scenes that have been witnessed there to be extended to the other States? Is that the purpose of the committee in urging the passage of this bill?

Mr. President, I do not undertake to say that the original measure was wise, that it was proper; but if it were so, history since that time would admonish us that it is more important now than it was at that time. At the time the bill passed there had been no serious outrages by local military power; but since that time they have been witnessed very frequently. The law in many localities has been trampled under foot, and the people and their property have been made subject to the government of a lawless militia. It seems that the proposition to repeal the restraining law is with a view of sanctioning and perhaps extending that system of government that is so odious. I shall not vote for the measure unless some reasons are given which have not yet been suggested.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, like the Senator from Indiana, I do not specifically recollect what the reasons were which led originally to the passage of the law which it is proposed to repeal. I am apprehensive, however, that the true reason will be found in the fact of a general distrust of the loyal character of the provisional governments formerly existing in those States, and that it would be dangerous to put an armed militia within their control. Whether I am correct or not I do not know; but I submit to the Senate whether we have not had some experience which should teach us the necessity of placing an armed force within the control of somebody for the preservation of order in those States. The Senator from Indiana refers to an abuse of the militia in some particular instances; but has he forgotten the fact that there are throughout many of these States the grossest irregularities and the grossest enormities which no force at the control of the General Government or the State governments has been able to put down?

I hardly feel willing to agree with the idea of my honorable friend from Vermont, that the States which have not been reconstructed, so called, should not have a militia force. There is no State in the Union, I presume, where there have been such gross outrages committed and so generally as in the State of Texas. What is the reason of this? It is found, in my judgment, from the absolute want of any sufficient force to control the irregularities and the outrages which will necessarily spring from such a state of society left so unformed at the period of a long and sanguinary war. For the sake of economy, so called, we have been in a very great hurry to reduce our military force. Very much has been said on both sides of this Chamber and on both sides of the other House of Congress upon the subject of the necessity of bringing our expenditures down to a very low point, or as low a point as possible; and one of the first things to be done was a reduction of the Army, and to that my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] pointed the attention of Congress at a very early day; and we did it. Now, sir, what is the complaint that we hear on all sides from the officers who have been put in the control of the military force in these several States? It is that they have no force at their command adequate to suppress irregularities and outrages upon the loyal people. A large portion of our military force is sent upon the plains and used elsewhere than in these States. What does General Reynolds tell you with reference to Texas itself? He says, if I remember rightly, that he has, and has had, no force that was at all adequate to protect the loyal people or the sober people of that State against murder and against all sorts of wickedness that have been perpetrated there by the loose population existing in portions of that State, perhaps the whole of it; and, if I remember rightly, (I may be mistaken,) he recommends—somebody certainly recommends; I have heard it somewhere—that the militia of that State, if you call it a State, should be organized in order that there may be some force adequate to the suppression of these outrages. Why, then, should we make an exception? Either increase your regular Army to a point where it will be made efficient, or else organize a militia in these several States and put arms in their hands, under the control of State officers if you please, or of somebody, for the purpose of affording the force necessary. Why, then, do you make an exception of Texas? It is not so bad in Virginia; that is at our own doors. I do not know that it is so bad in Mississippi; but with reference to the State of which I speak it is manifest that something should be done.

Sir, we have heard a great deal in the newspapers about these irregularities being the consequence of not having an earlier change in our Government. I cannot see for myself what General Grant, when he becomes President, is to do in order to suppress all sorts of violence in these several States unless you give him a force to do it with; and I do not see what the States themselves are to do—that is to say, the civil power of those States—unless you put into their hands a military force with which they can act. The civil power of itself, it is very evident, is very weak now; it can accomplish nothing. We see that no man who commits a crime is brought to justice. It may be that the civil power does not wish to bring him to justice in some instances; but it is very difficult for me to believe that respectable men, or men having the good of society among themselves at heart—and we must take it for granted that most of the men in power are so disposed—should not wish, if possible, to put an end to a state of society that renders their own lives and their own property, and the lives and property of their friends, entirely unsafe.

For my own part I believe that the great difficulty has arisen from the fact that we were in such a hurry to build up a reputation for economy that we diminished the Army far below what was necessary and what will be necessary for some years to come, without providing an adequate military force in the States to be under the control of the power of the States, or somebody's control, in order to repress violence and to see that these outrages were not perpetrated.

I hope, therefore, sir, on this view of the matter, that my friend from Vermont will reconsider, if this bill is to pass, his proposed amendment, striking out the States that have not yet been reconstructed. I believe that a militia force is as necessary there as elsewhere. I believe that a militia, or a military power of some kind, is necessary in most of these States, if not all of them, and that unless we bring about a condition of things in which there is a power lodged with somebody to repress by force the violence that takes place there continually we shall see no end to the troubles of which we have heard so much for the last year. They will continue, and they must necessarily continue, from the nature of the population and the kind of feeling that exists; and the moral force of an election will be found totally inadequate to bring about a change of circumstances and produce an orderly state of society.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I agree to almost all that my honorable friend from Maine has said. I agree to all the principles that he has advocated heartily. There must be additional force in the State of Texas; for illustration, in order to preserve order, and that force, probably, if enough honest and courageous and loyal men can be found to make it up, must be in the nature of a militia force. But the difficulty of repealing this general prohibitory clause will be, as it appears to me, with all deference to my friend, that it will authorize anybody and everybody in the State of Texas, under what they call its ancient militia laws—because the theory of the majority here is that it has laws—to organize a militia hostile to the Government that we are undertaking to administer there, hostile to the peace of those men whom we are trying to protect, and that "confusion worse confounded" will result from leaving it in such a condition. Now, what I propose to do is for the time being to leave this general prohibition just as it stands, making all military organizations, as such, illegal in that State and in these two others. Then I should hope that speedily the Committee on Military Affairs would report a bill which shall authorize the military governor of the district of Texas to select such volunteers, or to organize such militia, selecting the loyal and the patriotic from the dishonest and the violent, as will enable him to protect the peaceable and loyally disposed persons in that State.

Now, I submit to my friend from Maine whether there is not great danger, if you leave the door entirely open in the State of Texas to the formation of militia, that you will find a militia formed, a majority of which, at least, will be as hostile to your present government and to your present order as the disorganized elements of disturbance that exist there now are. I should certainly fear it from the composition of that society. Hence, the only safe militia, the only safe local assistance that you can obtain, must be a selected militia, selected by the government of that State, whether you call it military, or provisional, or civil, selected under the authority of Congress (which may provide for such things constitutionally) from that portion of society who are desirous of upholding order and maintaining government. For such a purpose I should hope that the Military Committee would bring in a bill speedily, because unquestionably the state of things there demands it, and demands it strongly. But, in advance of that, to repeal everything that we now have as a safeguard against unlawful and illegal organization, whose purpose would be to overthrow the order that we desire to maintain, would, it appears to me, be exceedingly unwise. This is the reason, Mr. President, why, with entire deference to my friend, it appears to me it is better as to those States, for the moment, until we can make special provision, to leave the law as it is.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I could hardly believe that I understood aright the honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] when he expressed his disapproval of this general measure, without allusion to the particular amendment pending. I have been taught by a somewhat long experience that the things which this subject brings up were prominent among the complaints made in the country by those holding the political sentiments of which the Senator from Indiana is a distinguished exponent. According to the complaints to which I refer, I supposed that the two great offences committed by one of the political parties in this country were, first, denying equality to certain of the States in this Union and establishing discriminations and disabilities applicable to them which were not and could not be imposed upon the adhering States; and second, in so arranging the police (if I may so style it) in the lately rebellious States that the force employed there to preserve order was drawn from the regular Army, and was an onerous and wicked tax upon the people of the country.

Surely I cannot be wrong in supposing that for months and for years the political organization which holds sway in this Chamber has been on trial and kept on trial for nothing more often or more constantly than for the two matters to which I draw attention. Here, now, is a proposition to put an end to all possibility of complaint in both these regards; first, to restore to their old sovereignty, as we used to hear it called, to their Statehood and equality, all the communities in recent years ostracised; and second, to deduct from the budget of estimates that unascertained sum, that unknown quantity, which, in Democratic rhetoric, has been one of the most enormous sums which ever entered into the expenditures of this nation; that sum, whatever it may be, which has been rendered necessary by the fact that any force of the regular Army has been employed in preserving order in the South. According to this bill hereafter Alabama, like Indiana, is to be permitted, through her own sheriffs, to call out her own posses; and to be permitted in all respects to guard and conserve her own tranquillity in her own way, at her own expense of military organization, and the national Treasury is to be emancipated from that onerous and shocking servitude to the supposed conveniences of the South or of one party in the South, which, as I say, has constituted one of the crying evils by which the hearts and the interests, material and otherwise, of the people of this country have been wronged.

Now, sir, I can hardly understand how it is that after all the education we have received in the press and on the stump, and in this Chamber, as to the impropriety of both conditions of things which this bill is intended to remove, we should be discouraged when now, on the motion of the majority of this Chamber, we propose to do in two essential respects the very things which we are told should have been done long ago.

As to Texas, Virginia, and Mississippi, there is undoubtedly, it seems to me, a distinction to be made, at least in estimating the probable workings of this proposition. I rose, however, not to speak of that, but of the general view which struck me. Unlike the honorable Senator from Indiana, I shall vote for this bill with a very tolerable security that it will make things no worse in the South than they have been recently, no worse than they are now; that any change is likely to be for the better, and that it will enable us in the majority at least to accept gracefully the true issue which has been afforded us so copiously heretofore, and to learn from our enemies, at least so far as to put in practice an experiment which they thought would have been wholesome long ago.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I do not intend to be led into a discussion of the past policy of the majority party of the country at this time; but, in reply to the Senator from New York, I intend to go only so far as to say that there was much complaint made of his party because at the meeting of the Thirty-Ninth Congress that party found in the southern States established governments with machinery working, courts established, and for the purpose of breaking those governments down and establishing in their stead governments for the time being resting upon military authority, to be followed by governments resting upon the consent of but a part of the people, the military power of this Government, at great expense to the people, was used. That was a matter of complaint, and I think it will stand in history against the party as a great offense to the interests of the country.

But, Mr. President, it was thought advisable by the majority party to declare by law that in the southern States, because of the condition of society there, of its divided character, there should not be military organizations. That is your law. For what reason was that law enacted? Upon what policy was it declared? And what has occurred since to change your policy, to remove the reasons that induced you to establish the law? Is it the conduct that we have read so recently of in the newspapers where private rights are crushed beneath the foot of an irresponsible local military power? Is it because by that military power men without trial have been executed? Is it because the free election in one or more of the States has been denied to the people through an irresponsible local military authority? Is this the teaching that has induced the majority party to change its policy and now to propose to repeal the restriction? It was to that feature of this question that I called attention.

I desire, sir, to see governments once more restored in the southern States based upon the American idea that the people govern. The governments in the fall of 1865 did rest upon that idea. You have reversed it; and I repeat that if we are to have a military government I prefer a military government that shall be under some safe or reasonably safe control. The military authority that is springing up in some of the localities is destructive of liberty and of personal safety. And is it because the information we have teaches this that you propose now to repeal a law which you declared at one time to be necessary? This was the inquiry I made. I want to know why it is to be repealed; what are the purposes for which the military power of the United States is to be withdrawn, to be substituted, I suppose, by an irresponsible local military force? The danger of that is this: your policy has placed one portion of the community, a minority of the community in many of the States, in absolute government over the majority; and to maintain that you have to resort to military power.

Military power is not ordinarily looked to for the preservation of the peace of society. We do not in the State of Indiana nor in the State of Maine look to an army to maintain the peace and quiet of society. We look to the law; we look to the courts. The only necessity in these southern States for the maintenance of a large military force results from the fact that you have attempted to reverse the American doctrine and to declare that by force the power of States shall be placed in the hands of a minority, and that a majority shall be governed by a minority, stripping classes of the right to participation in the government of a country, and then by force governing them. That is the necessity. Do away with that necessity; establish law; restore government to the people; let all participate who are willing to obey law, all who honor the Constitution and respect the flag of the country now; let them come in and participate in the government of the States, and there is no need of looking to a military force to maintain local order. Law does its work; but when law is broken down, and in its stead mere power is asserted, then you must have your military force.

I think it was due to the Senate that the chairman urging the passage of this bill should explain the necessity for its passage now and the considerations which governed the committee in making the recommendation. I shall join with any Senator in any measure that shall restore the civil law—that government which the people of this country have been accustomed to where they themselves govern themselves. When an outside power is to govern, then it is expensive; then you have to resort to a military force.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, it strikes me that what the honorable Senator from Indiana has been indulging us with is a very good part of the old story which I thought we had pretty much heard over. Why, sir, can he see no difference which should exist in the opinions of gentlemen on this side of the Chamber—to use the word metaphorically—with reference to the condition of things which led to the passage of that law, and the condition of things which calls or might call for its repeal? We all know, sir—the fact cannot be disguised—that the great majority of the people, or the great majority of those who represented in this Chamber and in the other House of Congress the majority of the people, had no confidence whatever in the governments established by the President and under his authority in these formerly rebel States; and they believed that to put into their hands or to keep in their hands a power to strengthen themselves by military force was only aiding to perpetuate that power and to perpetuate difficulty and trouble which we thought should be put an end to in another way.

Now, sir, it is well known that I have not agreed with all the details of the legislation which has been adopted here in Congress to the end that I have been speaking of. But legislation has been adopted of an entirely different character, leading to the reconstruction of the States, leading to the formation of civil governments, which civil governments, when formed, were to be preëminent and were to have the control of the civil affairs in those States. For myself, I was not exactly convinced that when those governments should be formed by the people they would be able to sustain themselves in all instances, such was the character of the population and such was the nature of the feeling existing in those States; and if I may claim to myself at all anything of the spirit of prophecy, I think it has turned out so in some small degree, to say the least of it. But, sir, governments have been established in most of them—governments of the people.

The honorable Senator talks about putting a majority into the hands of a minority. What we have been aiming at all along, and have accomplished so far as it could be accomplished, was to put the power into the hands of the majority of the people and to take it out of the hands of a minority which had always exercised it before and which claimed to exercise it now, and in whose hands the honorable Senator and the party with which he acts wish to continue it henceforth and forever. That is the truth of it. It is not that we desire to put the power or keep it in the hands of a minority. No, sir; let the majority rule in the true democratic sense of the word, and not the majority of a small minority who claimed to govern all within their view. And that is the offence that we have committed.

But, sir, we have abundant proof—proof which philosophy would teach any man we must have—that so long as power continues in the hands of a class where the honorable Senator would have desired to keep it always the result must be a state of society which it would take long to reorganize, long to bring it into order, long to make peaceable and orderly; and that is what we have seen. Rebellion left these States without government. Rebellion, of course, left them in the very worst possible condition in the world for such a population: the great majority of the white population uneducated, and a very large portion of it disorderly from its very nature, poor, having been oppressed, and having and feeling no responsibilities; and added to that another class of freemen come into existence as freemen, perhaps in a very small degree prepared for it, but which, I must say, has shown wonderful adaptation to an orderly state of society, considering all the circumstances.

Now, sir, what is the result? The result is that we find civil governments in those States. The result is that we have withdrawn substantially the military power which kept all these disorderly elements in a state perhaps of comparative fear of offending against the law. We have withdrawn that power, leaving substantially to General Reynolds and other officers who have the command of troops and who have the power to a certain extent in those States, as they say, no sufficient authority and no sufficient force to enable them to keep these people in order. Well, now, what are we to do? Are we to increase the military force of the United States? Such would seem to be the course pointed out by the honorable Senator from Indiana, either that or to leave them as they are, disorderly, uneducated, prejudiced, ignorant, violent, having no responsibilities to society that they care about, and desiring and wishing to keep up precisely that same state of things for their own benefit. Something must be done, sir. Are we to leave them as they are? That such a state of things does exist we have proof that cannot be denied, certainly not as to the State of Texas and some others of those States.

Do you call for an increase of the military force of the United States, and placing them under strict military discipline? That is not what the honorable Senator from Indiana would recommend in words, however his argument may seem to point in that direction. He certainly would not wish to leave them as they are. What, then, is the only other course? There are civil governments there. Give them the power to organize the militia of those States; give them the power to repress violence by force; it is the only thing that can be done. Talk of the moral effect of an election upon such a people as that! Why, sir, they care no more about it than for the whistling of the idle wind. It must be force, to be exercised by men who dare to exercise it. Whether or not we have such men in power, chosen by the majority of the people of those States, I do not know; but I know what would be their plain duty. Since Congress decided that it would have these States organized under civil governments and readmitted here at this period of time—whether ready or not it does not become me to say—what is the course to be pursued?

If disorder and violence exist do not say to them, "You shall stand still and be murdered, and you shall stand still and have your houses burned over your heads; you shall have secret organizations pointing to violence always." Not at all, sir. Give them power to put down violence by force, and by that force which the Constitution of the United States recognizes as the proper force, the same that exists in Indiana, the same that exists in the other States of this Union which have not been troubled as these have been by rebellion and civil war.

The only question, as I understand, now is whether the same rule shall be extended to the States that are not thus organized; and to that point I addressed my remarks before. But that it is clear that you must do something must be evident to the mind of every man. Really I cannot see the propriety, under the circumstances, if we have organized governments in these States, of saying to those governments they shall not have the ordinary power which all civil governments should have of carrying their laws into execution. Why talk about the fact that the courts cannot be had recourse to because these governments have been formed? Sir, were the courts open before? Was justice administered without fear and with effect before? Not at all; and that it cannot be administered now is not owing to the fact of elections and civil governments existing, but because those civil governments have not the power to enforce their laws over a disorderly, a violent, and a vicious community. Sir, you must give it to them or else you must provide some other mode either more or less objectionable.

Mr. RICE. Mr. President, I had not intended to trouble the Senate with any discussion of this bill, although I have submitted a proposition of a similar character which has gone to the Military Committee. But as we have had in our State some little experience of the operation of a State government without force, it may not be improper for me to say a few words on this question now.

We were told last session that if no arms were issued to the southern States and no militia organized there peace would prevail; the election could be carried on without difficulty and without violence. We were told that if militia were organized it would tend to irritate those lately engaged in rebellion, and the result would be riot and violence. This last proposition has been well answered by the experience of the last three months. No militia was organized prior to the election, no arms were distributed, and yet the magnanimity was appreciated only by violence, by murder, and by assassination. We mistook the idea that being without protection, keeping ourselves defenseless, was liberality and magnanimity. It is not true. It did not prove to be true. In the State of Arkansas the result of that was that up to the time of the election there was a systematic course of assassination that resulted in the destruction of over two hundred Union men in that State. A member of Congress was killed, State senators were assassinated, members of the House of Representatives, registers, and leading Union men in various counties of the State were assassinated without any open violence, without any notice, without any opportunity of defense. That is the answer to the proposition that if we do not organize a militia the rebels will remain peaceable. It is not a correct proposition, nor is the military force of the United States sufficient to supply the place of this militia. The military commander of any State will tell you that he has no power to put in force any means by which he can prevent a systematic course of assassination, that it can only be done by the local authorities, that it can only be done by a militia which can pervade every county of the State. It can be done in that way, and it will be done in that way if it is done at all.

Take the southern States generally, take the State of Arkansas, that I know more about than the others, and those assassinations, that violence, have all been on one side. We have not sought the use of the military for the purpose of oppressing anybody; we have not resorted to violence to carry any point in those States. There has been no pretense from any where that a single Democrat, if I may call them that, was killed in the State of Arkansas prior to the election. There is, I understand, some complaint now that since the election some of the assassins have been arrested by the militia, and some of them perhaps hung. If such is the fact I am glad of it. If such is the fact it only shows that we ought to have had the militia prior to the election, and thereby prevented a large number of cases that did occur. I honestly believe that if the militia had been organized before the election armed violence would have almost been unknown in the State. All men fear force; they respect power; and all men treat defenselessness with a sort of contempt. Let us protect our States. Give them militia, and let the State governments and the loyal men of the State have the necessary protection. Then if those lately in rebellion ask us to be liberal, we can afford to be; we are in a condition where we can be liberal without danger, and I venture to say we shall be liberal. There is no disposition on my part or on the part of the Republicans of my State to be otherwise than liberal.

There is a disposition to enfranchise everybody there whenever we can place the State in a condition where the Union men and the Government itself will be protected; but at the present time the cry is that we have no regular government; that our State government is unconstitutional; that those opposed to it have a right by force to overthrow it at any time and not violate law. Until there is a change of sentiment on that subject it will be necessary to some extent to resort to military force to prevent attempts of that kind. When that is over, when we have the necessary means of protection, when we can suppress all such attempts, then, I say, we can and we ought to be liberal to all, and give every good citizen the right that any other good citizen may have.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question? Does he know whether or not the government of Texas is of that character that it would increase public security for them to have a militia?

Mr. RICE. I am not acquainted with the affairs of Texas except by information from people there; and they say that if they could have their local militia organizations in the counties they could prevent violence and bloodshed. They say that the United States military is only at certain leading points in the State, and cannot, from the want of numbers, be distributed to every county; that the disaffected take advantage of the absence of the United States military in those counties where it is not, and there commit their violence, while at the leading points where there is a strong military force no violence is committed. Hence they claim—and it is equally applicable to every other State—that in those counties where there is no United States military force a local loyal force would be the means of protecting the loyal people of the county. That is what is needed, and that is what we shall eventually have to have, and until we do have it Union men will be slaughtered from time to time. We cannot prevent it in any other way. The civil authorities are wholly inadequate from the fact that you cannot make an arrest without a posse, and there being no legal posse, the man is gone before you can get any Federal troops. Whenever there is an organized militia force in each county, and that militia force armed, the sheriff can call for a posse and arrest anybody that it is desirable to arrest. That is all we ask. We expect in the State of Arkansas, if we can get arms from the Federal Government, to be able to protect ourselves. We will not then ask of the Government any Freedmen's Bureau. We will not ask the Government for a single Federal soldier. We will take care of the State whenever we are put in possession of the means to do it. Until that time the assistance of the Federal Government will be necessary.

Mr. SAWYER. Mr. President, either the reconstructed States in the South have governments or they have not. If it was intended by the Congress of the United States that the governments which have been set up in those States should be real governments, having all the attributes which belong to State governments, there seems no good reason why the bill which has been reported by the Military Committee, or something effecting the same object, should not pass. We are not in a condition of society in the South where we can appeal to men's Christianity or civilization to protect us. I would, for my own part, and I have no doubt that most of the Republicans of the State of South Carolina would for their part, be glad if we could dispense with all force in carrying on the operations of our State government; but a large portion of the population in our State, as well as in the other States in the South, it is well known, is not well affected toward the Government of the United States; and particularly is it well known that it is not well affected toward the recently formed State governments which have been there set up. We are in the peculiar position of being apparently the dominant power in the State, while in fact we have not one single fire-arm where those who are opposed to us have ten. Those of us who represent the loyal sentiment in the State of South Carolina are an unarmed people, while those who are opposed to the loyal sentiment of South Carolina are an armed people, and have used their arms without stint.

That, Mr. President, is the position in which we in South Carolina are; and I have no doubt that that is practically and really the position in which most of the peoples of the southern States are placed. Now, if the government which has been set up in South Carolina, and in other southern States which have been reconstructed, is meant to be a real government, I ask, in the name of common sense, what reason there is for taking from it one of the attributes of a real State government? Why is it that there is any objection to putting those State governments on the same foundation upon which the State governments of Indiana and Massachusetts rest? The government of the State of South Carolina, and the governments of the other reconstructed States in the South, are in the hands of men who have been elected, not by a minority of the people, but by a majority of the people, even if you include in the opposition those men who are disfranchised by the acts of Congress. We have in most of those States a clear majority, even including the votes of all disfranchised men, had those votes been thrown. Those governments are the representatives of the majority of the people, and not of the minority.

It is true, Mr. President, and lamentably true, that those governments do represent a minority of the former wealth and power of those States; and when we reflect that the power of that formerly dominant faction was exercised in the way in which it has been exercised; when we reflect that the power which those men wielded brought about that revolution through which we have been passing, I think no Senator on this floor ought to be particularly anxious to see that the power is again placed in their hands. I think that the objection to putting into the power of the State governments the right to organize a system of militia when those State governments are in loyal hands comes with a poor grace from men who would have placed it in the hands of State governments that were disloyal. No, Mr. President, I conceive that the real objection to the passage of this bill, or something like it, is that it does go into the hands of a government which does really represent a majority. We ask for our State governments the same rights, the same immunities, the same powers of self-protection which are given to other State governments in practical and harmonious relations with the Government of the United States. That is all we ask. Can we ask any less? Can the American Congress give us any thing less?

It seems to me, Mr. President, that this is a simple question of justice and of fairness. If the American Congress intends to stand up and support these State governments, or place in their hands the power to support themselves, it seems to me that there can be but one answer to the proposition which is before the Senate. I trust that the bill will pass.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts, who introduced this bill, informs us that the President of the United States in his annual message has denounced the law which it is proposed to repeal. That is very true. He denounced it, not because of its present operation, not because circumstances have changed since it was enacted, but because at all times, both when it was placed upon the statute-book and every moment since, it was and is in his judgment a violation of the Constitution of the United States. One of the amendments to our fundamental law expressly provides that "the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed"—of course by this Government; and it gives the reason that a well-regulated militia in the several divisions of the country is necessary for the protection and for the interests of the people. When this law was passed it was passed in hostility to the State governments which then existed. There was a political reason for its enactment. It was intended to weaken and impair the strength and influence of those organizations which then existed in the southern States and had confided to them by the people, or by a portion of the people, the whole mass of local civil power.

Now, sir, that object has been accomplished. Reconstruction, constituted of the several measures which have obtained in Congress, administered in the southern country, has resulted in a reorganization of civil government such as was desired by the political party in the majority in these two Houses of Congress. Now, by repealing this law, by authorizing military force to come in aid of civil authority in the South, and by transferring articles of force, munitions of war, muskets, and other articles, from the national armories and arsenals, additional force and additional strength will be given to those organizations which were set up.

This is the simple explanation of what has been done and what it is now proposed to do. The party in power in Congress passed this law in order to weaken the then existing political governments in the South which were not in accord with them, which were not friendly to them—I mean in a political sense—and they now propose to restore to that section of the country all power over local militia and to furnish arms for their organization, because the political power which now exists is politically friendly to them; and it will be another element of influence and of power with them in maintaining themselves in the southern communities. It will influence elections, it will influence opinion and gather elements of strength about these organizations, and cause them to exist in the future.

This is of a piece with reconstruction. It is one of the features of reconstruction to withhold strength from those who were opposed to the congressional system originally, and now to extend it to those who propose to support it. I see no logical inconsistency in the course which those who support this bill have pursued as compared with that which they now pursue. As for myself, having voted originally against the measure because I thought Congress had no more power to enact it than they had to enact the other measures of reconstruction, with perfect consistency I shall acquiesce in the decision of the Senate. I suppose, of course, the bill is to be passed, and I have stated only so much to justify my own course, which is that of acquiescing in the repeal of this law, because, in my judgment, like other measures of reconstruction set up by Congress, it was without warrant of the Constitution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to modify the amendment I proposed so as to make it a little more perspicuous. I propose, after the word "States," in the thirteenth line of the amendment reported by the committee, to insert the words "North Carolina, South Carolina, Florida, Alabama, Louisiana, and Arkansas;" and after the word "States," in the same line, to strike out "lately in rebellion;" so that the amendment of the committee, if amended as I propose, will read:

That so much of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1867, as prohibits the organization, arming, or calling into service of the militia forces in the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Florida, Alabama, Louisiana, and Arkansas, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, the Senator from Pennsylvania has given us his explanation why the law of 1867 was passed, and the reason for repealing it now. I will tell that Senator the reason why at that time we disbanded the militia in the rebel States. The President, without authority of Congress and contrary to the will of the nation, had by a portion of the people reconstructed those States. A small portion—a disloyal portion of the people, a great minority of the people—took possession of those governments, organized them, and put them into the hands of unrepentant and unwashed traitors. They organized rebel militia, commissioned rebel officers; and they wore the rebel gray and used the arms they ran away with when the rebel armies surrendered to our armies. This militia went up and down the country disarming Union men, black and white, and committing outrages upon the people. The Congress of the United States did not like this mode of reconstruction, and the people did not like it any better, and Congress provided that those governments should be provisional only, and adopted a mode of reconstruction by which the great body of the people in those States could reorganize them. The object was to disband that rebel militia; to send them home, make them take off their gray uniforms, and get out of sight. So we passed a law disbanding that militia, and providing that they should not be reorganized until Congress gave authority to organize militia in those States. At the last session of Congress, after we had restored to their practical relations several of those States, and admitted their Representatives in these Halls, it was proposed to repeal this act; but the measure became involved in the fate of another measure, and it failed. Now we propose to repeal the disbanding act, and the President of the United States, in his message to Congress, asks us to repeal it. Under these circumstances I was a little surprised that the Senator from Indiana should so strenuously oppose a measure that the President had so strongly recommended. Most of these States, certainly North Carolina, South Carolina, Florida, Alabama, Arkansas, and Louisiana, have been reorganized, and have loyal Governors and Legislatures. Some of those Legislatures are now in session, and they should certainly have the privilege that belongs to a reconstructed and organized State, to organize their own militia for the enforcement of their laws and the maintenance of their authority. I certainly am surprised that anybody should oppose the bill so far as it applies to six of the reconstructed States lately in rebellion.

We have had, since the adjournment of Congress last summer, great outrages perpetrated in portions of the southern country. We have withdrawn our military forces in a great measure. We had but a small force there, only sixteen thousand men in all the ten rebel States, and we have withdrawn a large portion of that, except on the frontiers of Texas. We have had in the State of Louisiana such outrages that at the late election sixty or seventy thousand people of that State dared not go to the ballot-box to exercise the rights of freemen. In the elections through which we have lately passed not less than a quarter of a million of men were kept from the polls and kept from voting in the reconstructed States who had the clearest right to vote. In the State of Louisiana we have had three or four massacres. One man alone, a leading rebel, boasts that he killed one hundred and twenty men on one occasion. He brags of it; goes up and down the country boasting of it. Whether that murderer and braggart killed, on the occasion alluded to, one hundred and twenty or not I cannot tell, but he did kill a large number.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WILSON. Certainly.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I desire to ask the Senator if the very statement he makes in regard to this man is not the best proof that the fact never happened? Does not such boastful talk carry on its face evidence that it is not true?

Mr. WILSON. Well, Mr. President, the fact that this brutal creature made the boast would be to my mind evidence that it was not true; but we have the fact that at this massacre there were a great number of men murdered and a great number wounded. The Senator from Louisiana may know better the facts of the case than I do. At any rate, several hundred persons have been murdered in Louisiana since Congress adjourned last July, and more men have been murdered in the southern States for political reasons since Lee's army surrendered than were slain on the field of Gettysburg. Three or four thousand men have lost their lives in the rebel States since Lee's army surrendered, murdered for no reason except that they were either freedmen, or loyal men, or "scallawags," or "carpet-baggers," or officers of the bureau or of the Army.

Sir, I think we shall have more peace in that section of the country, and I hope in all sections of the country; that we shall have more peace in Congress and out of Congress, and that during the next four years, when we have a good man in the presidential chair, and get a very bad man, or at any rate a very foolish man, out—a man whose whole administration has been one inspiration of violence and wrong in the country—I hope we shall have peace all over the country, and prosperity and good neighborhood and kind feeling.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I voted against the propositions that are now proposed to be repealed, and I did it upon the principle that Congress had no power to enact such provisions of law. I will now vote against the repeal for precisely the same reason. Congress has no power to legislate upon this subject at all, according to my comprehension of the powers of Congress. There is but one power in the United States that can organize a State government, and that is the power of the people of that particular State. Wherever a State organizes a government it has of its own inherent right and power authority to organize a militia for it. Congress has no right to abolish that militia after it is organized. Congress has no authority to invest that State with power to organize a militia. It has no right to prohibit that State from the organization of its militia. The exercise of this power belongs wholly and exclusively to the State and to the State government. If the State governments in these particular States are legitimately organized they have, as a necessary and an inherent power, the right to organize their own militia in their own way irrespective of the authority or prohibition or counsel of Congress. For that reason I shall vote against the repeal of a provision in an act of Congress which Congress had no power to enact, upon the principle that the subject is one over which Congress has no jurisdiction whatever.

Mr. President, as the honorable Senator from Indiana said, in the fall of 1865 all these States had legitimate State governments. They had governments formed by their own people, as that term was understood both in their State and in the Federal Constitutions. Those governments, according to my principle, were as legitimately organized and in existence as the government of Massachusetts or of any other State. What did Congress do when that was the condition of things? It intervened without any authority whatever; it abolished those State governments; it prescribed extraordinary and unconstitutional principles upon which State governments might be reorganized; it disfranchised large portions of the legitimate governing people of those States; and it attempted to enfranchise large portions of a people that had no political power in those States either under the Constitution of the United States or of the respective States. Congress, by this course of legislation, inaugurated anarchy and revolution.

Sir, what did Congress do? It abolished those State governments by its own will and legislation, and it required other governments to be organized for those States by a different power and upon different principles from those by and upon which the previous legitimate governments had been organized. Whence did Congress derive any such power as that? By its action it imposed upon the ten southern States a different form of State government, organized by a different power and having different relations with the Federal Government from those which all the other governments of the States had. There is no position more absurd and more preposterous than that Congress has the power to organize or to prescribe the mode and principles upon which a State government shall be organized. There is but one power on earth under our system of government that can perform that great political function, and that power is the people of the State. But Congress chose to exercise its usurped power so as to require the inauguration and installation and administration of a different government for those States from that which the people themselves had made for themselves respectively.

More than this; it not only changed the character and the source from which those governments originated, and made them different from the other States in those respects, but it established entirely different relations between those States and the Government of the United States from those that subsisted for all the other States. There were two systems of State constitutions and of the relations of the States to the Federal Government organized by the authority of Congress; and those two systems of government and of relations between the General Government and the State governments were materially and essentially different in those States from what they were in the other States of the Union. All this monstrous and incongruous exercise of power, with its results of disorganization and anarchy and violence and bloodshed, was the legitimate offspring, and not only the offspring but the actual fruit, of the legislation of Congress. There never was a more unauthorized and fantastic and mischievous exercise of power by any tribunal on earth that claimed to have power. There never were acts that stood so flagrantly condemned by the principles of the Constitution and by every principle of legitimate power which the Congress could claim for itself under the Constitution.

Sir, what did Congress do? It disfranchised the white men to such an extent as to give political power to the negro and the adventurer. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts, I believe, used the phrase and spoke of "scalwags and carpet baggers." I believe those are legitimate phrases. Congress so exercised its alleged authority as to give to the negro—who had no political power, no capacity for self-government, no capacity for self-civilization, who has been nothing but a great disturbing element in the political organization—and the carpet-baggers and scalwags the whole political power of the States over the legitimate people. Congress, by its authority, introduced the government of the stranger into ten States. It gave to the stranger the illegitimate power of the negro vote, and it deprived the opponents of the stranger, in his adventure to take possession of those governments and to administer them, of the benefit of large numbers of the legitimate and constitutional people who had exercised, and who were rightfully entitled to exercise, the political power of those States. In that way Congress manipulated, fashioned, formed, controlled these spurious governments set up in those States by the stranger.

What has been the consequence? The government of the stranger is always tyrannical and oppressive and detestable to the native people in any country. In Ireland, in Poland, in Italy, everywhere on earth, in every country and age, the government of the stranger assumes the form of an oppressive tyranny and becomes hateful and odious to the native. What was the consequence here? Confusion, disorder, revolution, anarchy, violence, and bloodshed were the consequences. What power can compel any people to accept the government of a stranger that must necessarily assume such a character as I have attributed to these governments without the introduction and organization of anarchy and confusion?

If the legitimate State governments created by the true people of those respective States in 1865 had been in conformity to the views and policy of the majority in the two Houses of Congress they would never have been disturbed. It was because they were in conflict with the leading views, interests, and purposes of personal ambition, of party power, and of political aggrandizement of the majority in Congress that those governments were overthrown, and for no other reason.

Now, Mr. President, what did Congress intend, arguing from the provisions of the bill, to effect by the provisions that are now proposed to be repealed? It was to withdraw from the legitimate State governments organized by the people, existing by their will, their legitimate power of being sustained by the organization of the State militia of their respective States, as has been in substance admitted by the honorable chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, and as we all knew at the time these particular provisions were passed. Events have gone on as the majority of Congress desired they should. The legitimate popular governments, created by the people of their respective States, were lawlessly overthrown by revolution and violence, and new ones erected upon their ruins. The stranger, the minority, the untutored negro with no capacity for self-government, the scalawag, and the carpet-bagger—I would not have used these phrases if the honorable Senator from Massachusetts himself had not introduced them—backed by the armies of the United States have usurped those State governments. They are in possession of them; they are administering those governments with a view to their own good, with a view to strengthen and perpetuate the power of their creators here in the Halls of Congress; and with this positive, active, administering power of these perverted governments, they now come into Congress and ask for a repeal of this law that they may have the formal sanction of Congress to authorize a militia exclusively under the leaders of their own faction, and place the arms which they get from the Government of the United States in their hands, in order to enable them to rivet the chains with which they have bound the true people and the majority of these respective States. For one I will give no countenance to any such adventure by voting for the repeal of this provision.

Every State, by its own reserved sovereignty and power, by the express recognition of the provisions and principles of the Constitution, has the undoubted and unquestionable right to organize a militia for itself. The object here is to receive another sanction from the legislation of Congress that they are the legitimate governments of those States, that they may take possession of their military power, as they call it—the military power of a faction, of a minority—with a view to grind and press still further the majority.

These reasons, Mr. President, will govern me in the vote that I shall give on this question. I know that that vote is of no consequence, and that the views that I have expressed have no significance with anybody except myself; but they are the considerations upon which I act and upon which I always intend to act. Since I have been a member of this body I have always been free and perfectly disposed to vote for any constitutional and proper proposition, come from what party or what man it might; and I intend still to act upon that principle as an American Senator. Every proposition that I believe ought to pass I will vote for. None that I believe should not pass will I vote for; and I will not vote for this bill for the reasons I have given.

Mr. SAWYER. Mr. President, I do not propose to occupy the time of the Senate in attempting to controvert the opinions which have been expressed by the honorable Senator from Kentucky. I take it the avowed and determined policy of the country has sufficiently expressed the will of the people upon this point. But I wish to call attention to one remark which he has made in reference to the disposition which it is proposed to make of the military power which shall be placed in the hands of the governments of the reconstructed States by this bill. I do not entertain any doubt that the State which I have the honor in part to represent, and other States similarly situated, have a right to organize a system of militia; and yet this interdiction stands on the statute-book, and it seems to me wise that it should be removed.

I wish, however, to call attention to the spirit in which the present State government of South Carolina, for one State, has acted in regard to that minority which it is alleged by the honorable Senator from Kentucky this military power is intended to oppress. By the laws of the State of South Carolina, as passed by this pseudo government, or, as he calls it, this illegitimate government, every citizen of the State of South Carolina, no matter what his antecedents, can hold office under that government; every citizen in the State of South Carolina can vote in matters of State government and can hold office there; and what class of people was it that granted that privilege? It was the very class of people whom he characterizes as "carpet-baggers, scalwags, and ignorant negroes." The policy of those men who have set up the government of South Carolina in that State, and which is now in harmonious relations with the United States Government, has been to open the door to every man in South Carolina to any office in South Carolina. I am not afraid in that State, if this bill does not prevail, that the power will pass into the hands of the defeated leaders of a "lost cause;" but I claim that the State of South Carolina and every other southern State which has put itself into proper relations to this Government should stand on the same base as any other State in the Union.

With these few remarks in allusion to some things that the honorable Senator from Kentucky has said, I will take my seat.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, one single word as to this question of majorities and minorities. I do not hold that the passage of this bill is at all important to the State which I have the honor in part to represent here, because I hold that we have the right now, being restored to our full relations to the Federal Government, to organize a militia of our own, and that we could have done so at any time in the past, this law to the contrary notwithstanding. Article two of the amendments of the Constitution provides that—

"A well-regulated militia being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed."

But to remove all doubt, I am willing to vote for this bill. It simply puts it in the discretion of the Legislature of each one of these States whether or not they will organize a military force in support of the civil authority.

Now, I will say as to the State of Alabama that in that State all men vote. It is the theory of our Government, and I believe of all republican government, that it shall rest upon the consent of the governed; and I will say to the honorable Senator from Kentucky that the government of Alabama rests upon a broader base than his government of Kentucky, for it rests upon the consent of all the governed. By our constitution all those who are disqualified from holding office by the fourteenth article were disfranchised; but power was given to the Legislature to relieve them; and a Republican Legislature, the first one that convened, in which the Republican party had a vast majority, had nine tenths of the members, by a nearly unanimous vote removed that disability and allowed every man to vote in the State of Alabama, whatever may have been his antecedents or his past conduct.

As to minorities governing, I will say to the honorable Senator from Kentucky that that was the cry that his political friends made in my State. They said that we had forced upon them a constitution contrary to the will of the people; that it did not rest upon the consent of the governed; and they declared in our legislative halls that when they reached the ballot-box they would sweep us from power and drive us from the State as with a whip of scorpions. We gave them that opportunity. We met them at the ballot-box on the 3d of November last, where every man in the State could vote, and there, upon a vote which was not a fair one to us by any means, we beat them by a majority of over five thousand, demonstrating to the country and to Congress, I hope, that our constitution does rest upon the will of the governed, and that the party which made it is in the ascendancy in our State.

As the Senator from Arkansas has well said, it is gentlemen of the political faith and belonging to the political organization to which the honorable Senator from Kentucky belongs that alone make any military force necessary in these States. All that the loyal men ask for in these States is simply peace and order, the right to vote and the right to speak as they shall think proper, having due regard to the abuse of that right. That is all that we have claimed and all that we ask, and whenever the political friends of the Senator from Kentucky shall accord to us these rights, the right of every American citizen to vote and to speak as he pleases, whenever we shall have the same freedom of speech and of the press and of political action in Alabama and these other States that they have in Ohio, then the necessity for any military force will have passed away. The only men who stand in the way of that condition of things are the men who belong to the political faith of the Senator from Kentucky. It is in their power any day to say that military force shall be unnecessary, and shall not be used in our State.

But let me tell the honorable Senator from Kentucky and gentlemen of like political faith that we intend to maintain these governments in these States. They do rest upon the will and consent of all the governed. They have been sanctioned by the law-making power of the country, and that action of Congress has been sanctioned by the American people at the ballot-box. With this sanction we intend to stand by them and to maintain them; peaceably, we hope, but forcibly if necessary; and if military force shall be necessary to preserve order and peace and secure the rights of the citizen and the maintenance of these governments we will use it, and native and carpet-bag Union men will stand shoulder to shoulder in the support of these governments.

For my own part, I will say to the honorable Senator from Kentucky that I glory in that progressive spirit which made me a carpet-bagger. I began my carpet-bag career seven years ago in the State which the gentleman from Kentucky has the honor in part to represent here. I met a good many of his friends there, and I have met them since; and I will say that I followed the lead of that great carpet-bagger whom the people of the United States have selected for their Chief Magistrate. We are in these States by virtue of the Constitution of the United States; we are there as citizens, and we intend to remain there, and to protect these governments, as I said before, peaceably and quietly and in good will and in a spirit of kindness, we hope, but forcibly if necessary.

Mr. DAVIS. I have only a word in reply to what the Senator from Alabama has said. He has very courageously proclaimed that they intend against all odds to maintain and sustain the government of Alabama as it exists. That is a very brave declaration, and the honorable Senator makes it with great boldness of manner. But suppose there was no military force moving from this center, this capital, and from States and places outside of Alabama, what would become of the honorable Senator's negro government and of his representation of it in this body? I am inclined to think they would be fugitives from it.

Now, this was one of the important principles which I laid down, and I maintain it; I may be forced to submit to the contrary, as I have been, and of course I will yield with all the grace that I can: I never will consent that the Congress of the United States shall vote to force negro suffrage upon the State of Alabama or the State of Kentucky or any other State; and I assert that Congress has not a vestige of power to enforce such a constituency upon the people of any State.

The honorable Senator refers to me and to politicians of my stripe. I do not know that he knows anything particularly of my politics or of my political principles. I have announced to him one principle in the sentence I have just closed. He seems to be very much enamored with the idea of negro suffrage, and he seems to think that I and my political party are responsible for the non-existence of that political power in the other States. Who voted down negro suffrage in Kansas? Who voted down negro suffrage in Ohio? Who voted down negro suffrage in Michigan, but the honorable Senator's political friends? I believe this position to be incontestably true: that if the two parties for the last four years had occupied contrary positions, inverted positions, there is not a solitary Republican in Congress or out of Congress who would have voted for a single measure that has been proposed by their party, if those measures had been proposed by the Democratic party; certain I am that I should have voted against them all. Now, when Ohio by over forty thousand, Kansas by eight or ten thousand, Michigan by twenty or thirty thousand, and all the northern States, where there are no negroes to vote, voted down the principle of negro suffrage by such immense majorities, with what grace can they or their auxiliary, the Senator from Alabama, vote to force negro suffrage upon the ten southern States, under the principle of the Constitution of the United States that the people of a State have the sole and exclusive power of framing their own governments.

Sir, I shall not follow these remarks. I did not intend to make any when I entered the Chamber to-day; but I tell the honorable Senator that I am a devotee to the Constitution of the United States. I have pledged myself to the Union, the Constitution, and the enforcement of the laws. I have always held to that position, and I intend to do it for the remnant of my days; and all the energies that I possess shall be enlisted and exhausted, if necessary, in the effort, however vain it may be, to bring back the Government of our country to the great and imperishable principles of the Constitution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] to the amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment of the committee, as amended, was adopted.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the title be amended so as to read: "A bill respecting the organization of militia in the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Florida, Alabama, Louisiana, and Arkansas." The amendment to the bill makes it necessary to change the title.

The amendment to the title was agreed to.

RETURN OF A HOUSE RESOLUTION.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House requested the return of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 332) authorizing the appointment of examiners to examine and report upon the expediency of discontinuing the navy-yard at Charlestown, Massachusetts, and uniting the same with the yard at Kittery, Maine, erroneously transmitted to the Senate as passed.

The Senate proceeded to consider the message of the House of Representatives, and, on motion of Mr. SHERMAN, it was Ordered, That the Secretary be directed to return to the House of Representatives the joint resolution (H. R. No. 332) authorizing the appointment of examiners to examine and report upon the expediency of discontinuing the navy-yard at Charlestown, Massachusetts, and uniting the same with the yard at Kittery, Maine.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee, it was Ordered, That the memorial of A. W. Walker on the files of the Senate be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. YATES. I move that Thomas Wolfe have leave to withdraw from the files of the Senate his petition and papers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Has there been any adverse report?

Mr. YATES. An adverse report was made by the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is against the rule to withdraw papers where an adverse report has been made, unless there is new evidence in the case.

Mr. POMEROY. I think there is no rule against withdrawing papers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I am told there is no rule against it. It struck me otherwise. If there is no such rule, the papers will be withdrawn, no objection being made.

Mr. YATES. The papers are intended to be used in another prosecution in the courts.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. POMEROY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 692) to amend an act entitled "An act concerning notaries public for the District of Columbia;" which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

MISS SUE MURPHEY.

Mr. HOWE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 625.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 625) for the relief of Miss Sue Murphey, of Decatur, Alabama, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to require the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be paid to Miss Sue Murphey, of Decatur, Alabama, the sum of $7,000, in full compensation for damages done her farm in Decatur, Alabama, by reason of the same being occupied for military purposes, and for the destruction of the buildings and other property thereon.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to inquire whether the committee reported favorably on this bill or not?

Mr. ANTHONY. They did.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It opens a very important question, indeed. At this particular stage in the session I think it had better go over until to-morrow, so that we may think of it. If we enter upon this class of legislation of course we must do it with the expectation of doing justice to everybody who is similarly situated. I have at least one constituent who had property taken and used for military purposes—a poor female school teacher, whose wages were taken—and who the Committee on Claims has decided is not entitled to anything on account of the peculiar circumstances of affairs in that country; and I acquiesced in that report at that time. I think it right, before we enter on this course, that we should consider pretty thoroughly what it is to lead us to, and what are the grounds and limitations upon which and by which we are to proceed. I move, therefore, so that I can look at the report and consider this question, that the bill be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will not insist upon that motion. This bill has been before the Senate since the last session. It was reported from the committee at a previous session and passed the Senate, went to the House of Representatives during the last Congress, but did not get there in season to be acted on by the House. At the last session it was reported again, but reported too late to secure the consideration of the Senate.

There is but one fact involved in the case, and that is that the Government took possession of this claimant's land, on which were buildings, took the buildings down, erected a fort upon the premises, and occupied the fort as long as they pleased; and this sum is reported here as a proper sum to compensate her for the loss accruing to her from this direct act of the Government.

The Senator says that in another case a similar principle was involved, and that the action of the committee was adverse. I am inclined to think that in that statement the Senator is correct. I am inclined to think that the committee were mistaken; at least I believe I myself was mistaken as to the facts in that case when the committee acted upon it. I have not a distinct recollection of the facts of that case, but I have a general recollection that I did, after the report was made, go over the papers again, and did think that the committee were mistaken at the time they made that report. But I believe the principle involved in this case is one that the committee intend to abide by. It is one that they have recognized in several cases already, and I do not know that they have ignored it. I think they have not ignored the principle knowingly, deliberately, in any case. I hope the committee never will ignore it. It is so plainly just to my mind that the Government should pay for the damage which they deliberately do to a friend of the Government—that seems to me so manifest an act of justice that I hope never to see it ignored by this Senate or any other; and therefore I hope the Senator will not insist on his motion to postpone.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend from Wisconsin cannot excel me in a disposition to do justice; certainly not in the abstract; practically he may excel all of us. But I think the Senate ought to reflect pretty thoroughly upon this whole subject before it commits itself to a precedent which, if followed, as it ought to be followed if we commit ourselves to it, of course—because we cannot give fish to one and flesh to another—will involve the expenditure of millions upon millions of the public money. I am not one of those who contend that we are to refuse to do justice because it involves the expenditure of a great deal of money; but I am one of those who contend that we ought to consider pretty seriously whether justice does require us—and I do not now take the opposite of the proposition—when we are carrying on military operations in a hostile territory, and in the course of those military operations we happen to march over and destroy the field of a loyal citizen, to make compensation to him. We should consider whether that is not one of that class of cases where every citizen, as the common phrase is, takes his chance. Does it not stand upon the same principle as if it were destroyed in a battle, where the operations of both parties, or the operations of the enemy alone, produced the result?

Now, as I say, I do not maintain the proposition that in no instance can a loyal citizen whose property has been injured by military operations obtain redress; but what I do say is that we ought to act, in setting a precedent of this character, upon the most deliberate consideration with reference to the limitations which should operate in such cases, with reference, at this present time, to the possible ability of the country to make this compensation, which in the end, perhaps, it may be clear that we ought to make; because, if the public in the southern States where military operations were carried on, and in some of the northern States, understand that we are now ready to receive and act upon applications of this character, and to make compensation to every person who can establish his loyalty whose property has been taken or destroyed in the course of the war, we shall certainly have business enough upon our hands, and we shall be required to enlarge somewhat the taxing operations of the Government to raise money to meet it.

It is true, I repeat, that this is no argument against the intrinsic justice of the claim; but it is an argument, as it seems to me, against with any haste (because this may be considered to be haste now; it is opened for the first time this session) proceeding to take a step which once began we must follow out, and from which we cannot justly or honestly recede. I make no observation in my motion to postpone against the justice of this claim, or at this present time against the principle upon which it rests; but I, for one, before I vote for it or against it, should wish some little time to reflect upon it. That is all I have to say.

Mr. ANTHONY. I had the honor to be upon the Committee on Claims when this bill was first reported and passed the Senate. I am not so familiar with the case now as I was then, but I believe I drew up the report, and I recollect very distinctly that the claim was perfectly made out. It was not a case where our soldiers had ravaged fields, but it was a case where by the command of the commanding officer of the district property was taken. It was proved to have been taken by competent authority for the purposes of the Government, and necessary for the purposes of the Government. The case was made out entirely. It was certified to by General Sherman and the officers under his command who executed his orders. It was a very hard case, indeed, and a case that appealed, and did appeal successfully at that time, to the justice of the Senate without there being any necessity for an appeal to its sympathy. The bill was passed by the Senate and went to the House of Representatives, and although there is in the House a rule which prohibits the consideration of any cases of this kind that rule was suspended. That fact itself, I think, is sufficient evidence of the opinion of the House upon the question; but there was not then time to pass the bill, and it failed for lack of time. It would have passed the Senate at the last session, I presume, if there had been time for its consideration. Now, sir, it having been so thoroughly considered; it having gone through a committee which certainly is not inferior to any committee in this Senate in the rigid exactness with which it examines the claims submitted to it; it having been passed once, I hope we shall not revive the discussion, but let it go through once more.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear the report read.

Mr. HOWE. There is no report, I think, accompanying this bill. There was a report made by the committee, and I think made by the Senator from Rhode Island, in support of the claim when it was first reported to the Senate, and I am not sure but that that report accompanies the present bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the report made during the Thirty-Ninth Congress is with the papers.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. ANTHONY on the 9th of July, 1866:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition and papers relative to the claim of Miss Sue Murphey, of Decatur, Alabama, have had the same under consideration, and make the following report:

This is a claim for compensation for a dwelling-house, out-houses, stable, carriage-house, &c., the property of the petitioner, situated in Decatur, Alabama, and taken for military purposes under the following order:

[Special Order No. 72.]

SIXTEENTH ARMY CORPS.
ATHENS, ALABAMA, March 19, 1864.

The necessities of the Army require the use of every building in Decatur for Government purposes. It is therefore ordered:

1. That all citizens living in Decatur, or within one mile of the limits of the town, on the south side of the Tennessee river, shall move outside of the lines within six days from the receipt of this order.
2. They will be allowed to go north or south, as they may deem best, and take with them all their personal and movable property.
3. As fast as the buildings are vacated the commandant of the post will take possession of them, and see that they are preserved, and no damage done them.

4. No exceptions to this order will be made except in the case of the families of persons in the Army or employes of the Government.

5. Brigadier General J. D. Stephenson will cause this order to be immediately complied with.

By order of Brigadier General G. W. Dodge:

J. W. BARNES,
Assistant Adjutant General.

General Sherman had previously issued an order to fortify Decatur for a military post. In the erection and construction of fortifications under these orders it became necessary to remove the buildings and fences belonging to the estate of Miss Murphey in the construction of Fort No. 1, and all the improvements on the property were either destroyed or applied to military purposes.

Major Whitehouse, adjutant general at Decatur when the property was taken, appeared before the committee and stated that he knew that a special order for the removal of the buildings was given, and that it was necessary to make this destruction of property of the petitioner in order to erect said fortification.

General Granger, in a communication to General John F. Miller, November 26, 1864, certifies: "Miss Murphey's house in Decatur was destroyed, not a vestige of it remaining, by order of the officer first in command at that place, under instructions from General Sherman to make Decatur a military post."

In compliance with orders received from Brigadier General R. S. Granger, commanding the district of northern Alabama, Colonel Joseph Conrad, commanding the post of Decatur, ordered a board of investigation to convene for the purpose of examining and reporting in the case of the property of Miss Sue Murphey. This board convened on the 13th of February, 1865, and after an examination as to the loyalty of the claimant and the value of the property reported: "We find the property destroyed, and value the loss at $7,000."

This report was approved by the commander of the post and indorsed by General George H. Thomas, commanding the department of the Cumberland, recommending that "Miss Murphey be paid by the engineer's department the amount of damage done her in the destruction of her house," &c.

The loyalty of Miss Murphey is fully sustained by the statements of officers of the Army above referred to and others, who were at Decatur during the war.

Miss Murphey's father was a captain in the United States service, and died some years before the breaking out of the late rebellion, leaving Miss Murphey and her sister the farm upon which these buildings stood, consisting of about one hundred acres of land, partly lying within the corporate limits of Decatur.

The committee are of opinion the property in question was properly taken upon military order, warranted by the necessities of the situation and for public use, under the direction of competent military authority, and that the owner is a loyal citizen of the United States; that the officers of the Army, in assessing the value of the property, acted upon well authenticated evidence, and therefore report the accompanying bill, and recommend its passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont to postpone the further consideration of the bill until to-morrow.

Mr. POMEROY. I never like to oppose or advocate a bill that I do not know anything about; but there is a principle in this bill that I do know something about. In the first place, I should like to inquire why this money cannot be paid under the existing law?

Mr. ANTHONY. Such was the decision of the engineer department, or the proper accounting officers. The Senate will see by the report that General Thomas directed that the amount should be paid by the engineer department.

Mr. POMEROY. I understand that.

Mr. ANTHONY. But the War Department, or the proper authorities, declined to do it, because they had no legal authority to do it. I think there were papers to prove that before the committee.

Mr. POMEROY. There are precedents, and there is authority.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think such a bill ought to be paid by the department.

Mr. POMEROY. My objection is not to this particular case, but that in going into this work now by piecemeal, one at a time, we shall be likely to do great injustice. When I do anything of this kind I want to do it in a way that will operate equally on all classes of sufferers of this character. I do not believe in passing a bill for one alone of a class. Why not take all the owners of property in the city of Decatur, and pass a bill covering all of them that are loyal? Why not have some general bill? Why select out this particular case? I understand there are a thousand cases in Decatur, not all like this, but cases of persons who were removed; who were put to inconvenience, who suffered. Is Miss Murphey better than all others, and to be preferred to all the others? I have no hostility to this claim, but I do not like this way of doing the thing.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, I suppose this may be a very hard case; and being a claim in favor of a lady who is said to be loyal, it is quite natural that it should excite very considerable good feeling toward the petitioner. I cannot vote for the bill, however, for the reason that it will, in my judgment, be establishing a precedent that will lead unquestionably to a very exhausting drain, to say the least of it, upon the Treasurer. Now, sir, I would ask with all due deference to General Thomas and the engineer department, in settling questions of law and right, what propriety there is, upon any legal principle, in our paying for this property thus taken? Our Army go into an enemy's country and take possession of a certain portion of it by force of arms, and while there they find it necessary for military operations that they should take a certain course with regard to some property thus situated. Under these circumstances they demolish a house, or perhaps more than one, for the purpose of military defense. Now, sir, I do not know that it can ever be established that any where, at any period of time, a hostile force in an enemy's country, taking possession of property for the purpose of defense is bound to pay for that property. If gentlemen can produce precedents and authority to that effect I shall be very glad to see them, and shall then with pleasure, under the circumstances, vote for this bill. By passing this bill you will be establishing as a principle that wherever our armies went in this hostile territory, war being flagrant, and found it necessary to take possession of what must be considered enemy's property, for the purposes of defense, merely erecting a military post or anything else of that description, all that property must be paid for. Sir, where shall we see the end of claims of this description if we once open the door to them?

I say these things very reluctantly, for having seen the young lady and heard all the circumstances, my sensibilities would lead me to vote for this bill. I should be glad to do it, but really I cannot consent to do so unless the gentlemen of the Committee on Claims, from whom it comes, will show me that it is according to the customary and received law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The law is the other way.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I understand, as my friend from Vermont says, that the law is the other way. The law being the other way, where will the Treasury see the end of these claims if you begin in a case of this description? What will be the amount that we shall be compelled to pay before this thing arrives at its termination? If this is the fact with regard to it, and if such is the law with regard to it, I ask gentlemen how they can venture to establish a precedent of this description? I remember now that this case came up at the last session, and I interposed an objection to it then and it went over. It was about passing when I interposed. I did not know that it ever passed the Senate afterward.

Mr. ANTHONY. It passed before at a previous Congress.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I did not know that. It was the first time my attention was ever called to it, and that was accidentally, and it struck me at the time that a precedent of this kind would be of the most dangerous character, and that we could not defend ourselves before the community that must pay all these bills if we began a practice of this description. I shall vote against the bill. If a majority of the Senate see fit to pass it the responsibility will not be upon me.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I think the Senate stands committed to the proposition that a measure like this ought to pass. I recollect that in the case of Ames we appropriated $9,000, and he received the money upon the ground that he was a citizen true to the country, living in the State of Virginia in the scene and area of the war, and that his premises, being an academy and a school, were taken in making necessary defenses; so that there is a precedent in the action of Congress in favor of this bill.

Now, Mr. President, suppose this lady had lived in a northern State and a commander had taken her property, the home in which she lived, had removed the buildings so as to make a defense or a hospital or for any other war purpose, is any Senator ready to say that he would not vote to pay her? Would we hesitate one moment to vote for compensating her? Then, I ask Senators if, in equity and justice, her claim is any less because she lived in Alabama, when it is established by testimony that we do not question that during all the time she was true to the country? In the northern States it was not affirmatively a merit to stand by the Government. Public sentiment was that way all the time, and a man or a woman went with the popular current in going for the cause of the Union; but in the southern States a party had, in my judgment, the additional merit of stepping out and meeting the current of public sentiment in order to stand by the flag and the Constitution. So I say this case is much stronger, if the facts be as stated, than if she had lived in Indiana or in Maine. There she would have had the support of popular sentiment; where she lived she attested her devotion to the country under circumstances that were very strong to resist indeed.

Mr. President, I do not admit the law as stated by the Senator from Maine. I know very well that in a war between independent nations each citizen is the enemy of the other; and why? It stands upon the principle that the character of each citizen is fixed by the character of the sovereign. If the king be the enemy of a particular nation all his subjects are its enemies. This was not a war of a government de facto against a government de jure. According to the doctrine maintained by Mr. Lincoln through his whole administration, it was a war, not by a sovereign, but by the inhabitants of the insurgent States against the rightful authority of the Government. That was the doctrine that governed the administration of Mr. Lincoln during its entire period. Then, sir, if that be the doctrine, each one was an enemy that made him or herself an enemy. There was no sovereign who could affix upon the citizen the character of a public enemy. If we are at war with England all of our citizens are at war with England, for the simple reason that the sovereign is at war with England, not that each citizen participates in the war; and I am not going to admit, I am not going to act upon the doctrine, that in the South each person was an enemy of the country. It does not follow from any legal proposition.

Each person that participated in the insurrection and rebellion was an enemy, but each person who stood by his allegiance to the Government was a friend, and it will not do to adopt the doctrine that obtains when there is a war between independent sovereignties—that the citizens living within the hostile districts are all public enemies. I do not think the doctrine applies in this case, and I claim that any one living in the southern States and standing all the while by the cause of the country has a stronger demand upon Congress to be paid for property that was necessarily taken in prosecution of the war than if he had lived in a northern State.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana cannot be aware, I think, that the Supreme Court of the United States have decided that in all matters relating to the ordinary incidents of war, as between nation and nation, the same rules and the same consequences are applicable to the States that were in rebellion after the war was initiated and properly declared and was understood that would exist between any two independent nations. That doctrine I take to be established, and no other doctrine could with any propriety be applied to the contest thus waged.

Now, sir, look at the consequences. It is said that this young lady was loyal. I take it that, being a young lady, her loyalty did not expose her to any very particular danger. She lived quietly there, and perhaps expressed her sentiments. Why, sir, if we admit that to be the rule which my honorable friend from Indiana seems now to suppose, how many are the people do you think in the southern States who lost property during the war who did not actually take particular open part in the rebellion who would not be able to prove their loyalty; to prove that they did nothing whatever, and that all the time they felt very friendly to the United States Government? How much property should we have to pay for that was destroyed in Sherman's famous march through Georgia and through the Carolinas? If the rule is that all a person has to do is to come forward and prove that he took no part in the war, and that he really occasionally said some very kind thing of the Government, and he is loyal, and if his property was destroyed for military purposes, the United States Government and the people who carried on the war must pay for it, where are we to be carried?

Sir, destruction of property is one of the incidents of war, no matter whether it is between two independent nations or between a nation and a portion of its people who have for a time made themselves independent and a distinct government. There is no possibility of drawing any distinction whatever between them in relation to the consequences of the warfare. If there is to be such a distinction, and this precedent is to be set, the amount of debt that we have already incurred in prosecuting this war must be doubled before we get through with it by claims that we shall have to pay for property destroyed of one kind and another. What is to prevent their coming forward and claiming compensation for slaves that have been emancipated in consequence of the war, except the effect of the constitutional amendment or something of that sort no more applicable to that than to anything else? All these consequences come one after the other, and we have to meet them one after the other as they arise.

Now, sir, my honorable friend from Indiana, in the view he takes of all questions relating to this contest may be right in regard to this case. He never has admitted that there was a war in reality going on. He has said that there was nothing but an insurrection down there of a portion of people who undertook to make a disturbance and oppose the execution of the laws. That is the Democratic doctrine, and that is the doctrine upon which they have acted, and which they have proclaimed here over and over again.

Mr. EDMUNDS. "A slight unpleasantness."

Mr. FESSENDEN. "A slight unpleasantness," as my friend from Vermont suggests. That is their doctrine, and on that doctrine my friend from Indiana can very well advocate the payment of this claim and of all other claims of persons who did not actually take part in the rebellion. It is one of the things that are, if possible, to make the war and the consequences of the war and the results of it unpopular in the eyes of this people, by heaping upon them burden after burden of this description.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Does the Senator attribute to me any such motive as that in advocating this bill?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Certainly not; I attribute no motive whatever.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then, it seems to me, the argument is not legitimate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I say the bill is in perfect accordance with the honorable Senator's theory.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Does the Senator attribute to me a desire to make political effect out of support of a bill like this?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I said no such thing. I attribute no motive to the Senator; it is not my habit to attribute motives; and there is no need of it in this case, because I take the honorable Senator upon his theory, upon which he has acted and which he has proclaimed here over and over again. All this doctrine of paying these claims is in perfect accordance with that theory; but it is not ours; and I say that this is one of those things which are hereafter, if carried out by overburdening our people with debt, adding to the public indebtedness immensely, if not doubling it, to make the memory of this war unpopular with them. The Senator cannot accuse me of imputing anything to him in that remark. I certainly do not mean it. I disclaim anything of that kind.

Now, Mr. President, my opposition to this bill is founded principally on the principle which I stated, that we cannot as a people afford, after all the destruction of property that has been necessary in the southern States, to make a distinction between loyal and disloyal persons. That people living there who were in their hearts loyal to this Government suffered was the misfortune of their situation. It is one of the calamities that are inevitable: the good must suffer with the evil, and the minority must take the consequences of the action of the majority. But if you undertake to say that this was not a war in the ordinary sense of the term, and that in addition to the burdens the people of this country already bear you are to heap on them the additional burden of paying for all property that was destroyed which belonged to persons who were not actually engaged in the conflict, there is no end to it, and there is no foretelling what the consequence may be upon the peace and prosperity of the people of this country hereafter.

A word now as to this estimation of damage. How much damage was it? What was that property worth at the time, exposed as it was to attack, exposed to be burnt every day by an attack that was to be made upon that place by an enemy, to be bombarded, to be destroyed? And, yet, according to the statement the officers who estimated the damage just sat down and actually estimated how much that property was worth in a time of profound peace, with these buildings exposed to no danger, and call upon us to pay for it as if it were worth as much there as if it had been situated in a quiet place in the free States anywhere. Why, sir, it is quite manifest to me that if you even establish the principle that we are to pay for it, the ground on which the amount of damage was fixed was entirely erroneous. However, sir, it is a matter that I have been drawn into simply from my desire that the Senate should pause before it establishes a precedent which I believe to be fraught with such extreme danger and calculated to lead to such extreme consequences.

Mr. YATES. Mr. President, this is a question which is important, because it must involve millions to the Government; and if the Senate is to meet it it certainly is one of the most important measures which we can consider. But the question arises in my mind whether it is not a matter more appropriate for the courts. Many points are to be determined—such as the loyalty of the person whose property was destroyed, the value of the property in question, and the circumstances under which it was destroyed. Legal questions, also, are to be met. According to the common law private property cannot be taken by the Government without compensation to the owner. A State cannot take the land of a private owner in the construction of railroads without first condemning the property and paying to the owner its appraised value.

Now, sir, however the question may be decided great injustice may be done. Certainly a man should not suffer on account of his loyalty. If the owners of private property are entitled to compensation from the Government, most surely those who are loyal to the Government under peculiar circumstances should receive that compensation. But, as the decision of the principle at stake must involve millions upon millions, I think if the Senate could avoid its decision at the present time by setting the precedent that the courts should decide all such cases, it would certainly be more advisable, and justice would be more certainly done.

Mr. ANTHONY. I wish to say a single word in reply to the suggestion of the Senator from Maine about the loyalty of this family. There is no doubt on that point. It was not the passive loyalty that he fancies it to have been; it was an active loyalty. Situated in that town, their loyalty, their attentions, their hospitalities, their kindness to the Union soldiers, subjected them to social ostracism. This house was always open. Our officers and men were always welcome there, and always nursed there in sickness, if it was necessary, and they received also from them valuable information. There is no doubt whatever of the active loyalty of this family. The children of an Army officer, they loved the flag under which he died.

It is too late, I suppose, to go on with this subject this evening; but when a committee, and that the committee which of all others is and must be most rigid in the examination of the claims submitted to it, reports upon a question of this kind, when it receives the almost unanimous consent of the Senate, goes to the other House, and is lost there for want of time, comes back here, and everybody has forgotten all about it, it seems to me rather hard that the Senate will not take the authority of their own committee, and also the authority of their own judgment, which they formed when they knew all about it, when the facts which they have now forgotten were fresh in their recollection. If this bill goes over now until my friend from Vermont shall become acquainted with it, then everybody else who knows anything about it will have forgotten it, and he, too, I suppose.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move that the Senate do now adjourn. It is evident that this question cannot be disposed of to-day.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

ANN BAGLEY.

On motion of Mr. BENJAMIN, the petition of Mrs. Ann Bagley, for a pension, was withdrawn from the files of the House and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

NILES'S REGISTER.

Mr. MUNGEN, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing, under the law:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the House five thousand copies of Niles's Register, to be put up and bound in the same style as the Congressional Globe is now printed and bound.

ENFORCING CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.

Mr. SYPHER asked consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to report a bill as soon as practicable for the enforcement of the third section of the fourteenth article of amendment to the Constitution.

The SPEAKER: This resolution is mandatory. Is there objection?

Mr. CHANLER. I object.

EDWARD KINDRED.

Mr. INGERSOLL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1551) directing the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Edward Kindred on the pension-roll; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and of the War of 1812.

ISSUE OF BONDS IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. INGERSOLL also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1552) to authorize the District of Columbia and the cities therein to issue coupon bonds and borrow money; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

COLUMBIA RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. INGERSOLL also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1553) to incorporate the Columbia Railway Company in the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the various votes of reference; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CIVIL OFFICES IN VIRGINIA AND TEXAS.

Mr. WHITTEMORE. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution for reference to the Committee on Reconstruction:

Resolved, That all civil offices in the provisional governments of Virginia and Texas, held by persons disqualified by the oath of office approved July 2, 1862, be, and the same are hereby, declared vacant; and it shall be the duty of the commanders of the districts to proceed immediately to fill the vacancies so created by the appointment of qualified persons who shall have been nominated and recommended by the respective Governors of said States.

Mr. CHANLER. I object, and call for the regular order of business.

CHARLESTOWN NAVY-YARD.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed by the Clerk that the joint resolution (H. R. No. 332) authorizing the appointment of examiners to examine and report upon the expediency of discontinuing the navy-yard at Charlestown, Massachusetts, and uniting the same with the yard at Kittery, Maine, which was referred by the House on the 3d of July last to the Committee on Naval Affairs, was erroneously sent to the Senate as having been passed. If there be no objection the Senate will be asked to return it, so that it may be referred to the committee.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

WAR CLAIMS OF IOWA.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has commenced, and the House resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1491) fixing the amount found to be due to the State of Iowa on account of certain claims against the United States, which was reported on Thursday last, by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. Dodge], from the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill was read. The preamble recites that Congress, by an act approved July 25, 1866, directed the President to appoint a commission to examine and report upon the claims of the State of Iowa for forage, transportation, subsistence, and clothing furnished by that State to volunteers; also for the repayment of certain moneys expended by the State in raising, arming, equipping, paying, and subsisting certain troops of the State during the late rebellion; and also the claims of the State for certain forage procured and barracks built and turned over to the United States. It further recites that the commissioner appointed by the President has, after an examination of the claims, reported that there is due to the State of Iowa $229,848 28, and recommended the payment of that sum. The bill, therefore, provides that the amount so found due to that State shall be paid to it out of an appropriation hereafter to be made.

Mr. GARFIELD obtained the floor.

Mr. MULLINS. Will the gentleman yield to me to offer an amendment to the bill?

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire first to make a brief statement of this matter. I regret very much that the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. Dodge], the member of the Committee on Military Affairs, who has charge of this bill, is not present, and I will state in a word or two the action of the committee in regard to it.

Under the law of July 25, 1866, a commissioner was authorized to be appointed to examine and audit and report on all claims of the State of Iowa against the United States for the equipment of troops and expenditures in putting down the rebellion that had not yet been accounted for. In pursuance of that law General Buchanan, of the Army, was appointed the commissioner, and made a very full and voluminous report, which was laid before Congress and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. There were accompanying his report some thirty documents, the titles of which are given on page 5 of General Buchanan's report, which has been printed and is now before the House as Miscellaneous Document No. 110. The report of General Buchanan, the commissioner, and the accompanying documents were examined by a sub-committee of the Committee on Military Affairs. They reported to the committee, and their report was approved, and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Dodge] was authorized to report this bill. The report proper of the committee has not been printed, but it is with the papers at the Clerk's desk. It is very brief, and I ask that it be read.

Mr. WARD. I would inquire of the gentleman if the bill has been printed?

Mr. GARFIELD. It has not.

Mr. WARD. I think a bill of this importance ought to be printed.

The Clerk read the report of the Committee on Military Affairs, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom were referred the claims of the State of Iowa for services and expenses incurred during the war, have had the same under consideration, and find that the examination and report by the commissioner, Brevet Major General Robert C. Buchanan, United States Army, under the law of Congress of July 25, 1866, has been faithfully and carefully performed; that a full examination has been made; that the vouchers and accounts have been properly audited, and the committee therefore recommend that an appropriation be made for the payment of the claims so audited and recommended in the report of General Buchanan, the commissioner appointed under the act approved July 25, 1866.

Mr. GARFIELD. Now, let me finish the statement I desire to make regarding this bill. The history of this bill is, in brief, this: on the 25th of July, 1866, the House of Representatives and the Senate passed an act authorizing the appointment of a commissioner to examine and report upon certain specified claims named in the original law. They were "claims of the State of Iowa for forage, transportation, subsistence, and clothing furnished by said State to certain volunteers of said State, under the command of Colonels Morledge and Edwards, at the request of certain officers commanding troops of the United States in the State of Missouri, and marched into the State of Missouri to cooperate with the troops of the United States in suppressing the rebellion." That was the language of the law describing the class of claims that were presented to this commissioner, to be by him audited, examined, and reported upon. The commissioner was to submit his report by December, 1867, and on the 6th day of December, 1867, he presented his report, which is printed as House Miscellaneous Document No. 110. In that report he states that there are two questions to be considered; first, what was the service rendered and the necessity therefor? and, second, were the expenditures made under the general heads reasonable and proper and in accordance with the spirit of the law in the case made and provided? Under these two heads the examinations were made, the accounts audited and reported upon, and thirty supplemental papers were forwarded in connection with his report, as the vouchers for all the decisions the commissioner came to in regard to the matter. These vouchers, and all the accompanying documents, were laid before the Committee on Military Affairs, and they were examined by a sub-committee. The result was the adoption of the report which has just been read at the Clerk's desk, and the printing as a part of that report of the exhibit and report of the commissioner appointed to examine and report upon the accounts. This was the order taken in reference to all the States which have hitherto had their claims against the Government adjusted. So far as Congress has settled the question at all it has settled this as the mode of adjusting the claims of a State.

The bill here proposed recites the law under which the commissioner was appointed, the character of the services specified in the original bill. Then the bill proper consists simply in authorizing the payment of the amount of money found due by the commissioner, whenever Congress shall make an appropriation therefor. This bill is not an appropriation bill, but an authorization to adjust the accounts of the State of Iowa on the basis of this report whenever Congress shall appropriate the money. The Committee on Military Affairs has done its duty as well as it could under the circumstances. If we intend to settle this claim at all, as we have done the claims of several other States, I know of no better way than this as the mode of settling it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield to me for a few moments?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I take it that almost every State in the United States has claims of a similar character to these, and resting upon about the same principle as these claims of the State of Iowa. But these particular claims seem to have been singled out and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, upon which there is one of the most distinguished and influential members of this House from the State of Iowa. That committee has reported back a bill to take this out of the general class of claims, and asks Congress to pass upon it. It does not propose to make an absolute appropriation of money. I called the attention of the House the other day to the peculiar language of the bill, which was to avoid a rule of this House, and gain an advantage which the bill should not have. This bill does not make an appropriation, but provides that the amount shall be paid out of any money hereafter to be appropriated for the purpose; and that, no doubt, was done for the reason that if the bill had made an appropriation, as it should have made, it would, under the rules of the House, have necessarily gone to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, where it could be fully and amply discussed in connection with all other bills of the same or a similar character.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I merely wish to state the facts in regard to the reference of this claim to the Committee on Military Affairs. The report of General Buchanan was first referred to the Committee on Appropriations. That committee reported it back to the House with a recommendation that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs for examination. That reference was made. The Committee examined the subject, and made the report which is now pending before the House. I remember very well that it was said in the Committee on Military Affairs that the question of making the appropriation ought to be left to the Committee on Appropriations, subject to the action of the House in regard to it. That is the reason the bill comes before the House in its present form.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I understand that matter very well; and that is the reason I endeavored to get in a motion to send this whole matter now to the Committee on Appropriations, to whom it properly belongs. Let them act upon the subject. If an appropriation is to be made, it is to be made upon the report of the Committee on Appropriations; and does this House intend to withhold from that committee the information they are entitled to have if they are to pass upon this claim? Hence I say it is proper and right and just that this bill, as reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, declaring that a certain amount is to be paid out of the Treasury when appropriated, should go to the Committee on Appropriations for examination; and I hope the gentleman from Ohio will allow me to make the motion to refer the bill to that committee, and will allow the bill to be so referred.

But, sir, there is another fact to which I wish to call attention. This bill does not contain the provision which has been embraced in almost every bill of a similar character—a provision which I distinctly recollect was inserted in the bill making reimbursement to the State of Iowa—that before the payment of the amount claimed a report should be made by commissioners, to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, and that even then the right should be reserved to the Treasury Department to audit the accounts. There is no provision of that kind in this bill. We propose to direct that the amount shall be paid, making no provision that the Treasury Department shall examine the accounts and ascertain whether they are correct—no provision for a revision of the matter by the accounting officers of the Treasury. And, sir, even if the gentleman from Ohio will not yield to allow me to make a motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Appropriations, I hope he will permit me to offer an amendment providing that before payment shall be made these accounts shall be audited and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman will allow me to explain. I should have said precisely what has been said by my friend from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON.] It was not on account of any seeking on the part of the Committee on Military Affairs that this matter was sent to them for examination. It was, in the first place, sent to the Committee on Appropriations, which committee very properly said that this matter involved in large part questions of a military character; and therefore the subject was sent to the Committee on Military Affairs, that they might examine and report whether the accounts audited in this case were proper military accounts. The Committee on Military Affairs made the examination in accordance with the order of the House, and have reported that in their judgment these expenditures were made in good faith for proper military purposes, but yet for purposes that were not arranged for by Federal law. For instance, the irruption of Indians on the west, and of rebel "bushwhackers" on the south, made it necessary for the Governor of the State to take immediate action of an extraordinary kind to repel the danger, there being no time to await the result of a resort to the slow process of correspondence with the authorities of the United States Government. These steps were taken by the authorities of the State of Iowa; and the men called out, the expenses incurred, were as really for the protection of the State against the enemies of the United States as if every step had been taken under the authority of the War Department of the United States Government. But these expenses were not incurred in such form and upon such vouchers as the Government of the United States requires; and, therefore, they could not be audited under such rules as are followed in the auditing of accounts by the United States authorities. They were, however, incurred and audited in accordance with the laws and regulations of the State of Iowa. Hence, this special commissioner examined them as made in accordance with the laws of the State of Iowa, not the laws of the United States.

The Committee on Military Affairs have now reported back the military part of the bill, merely declaring that they regard the expenditures as having been made in good faith for proper military purposes. We distinctly declare in the bill that we do not propose to make any appropriation, leaving that matter to the future action of the Committee on Appropriations. That matter is to be left to the Committee on Appropriations. We have stayed by the line of our duty, and intend to discharge that duty by reporting this bill to the House and asking that it be put upon its passage. Whether the House shall make an appropriation depends on the action of the Committee on Appropriations. I have not the slightest objection to such an amendment as the gentleman from Illinois suggests, that this payment hereafter to be authorized by appropriation shall be subject to any revision or any new audit which may be demanded to protect us against any possible mistake. I have no objection to that; and if the gentleman has any amendment to secure us against any possible danger in that regard I will give way for it. But I cannot consent, under the instructions of my committee, and the House also, to allow this bill to be referred to the Committee on Appropriations without first having the action of the House on it.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of the bill—

Mr. GARFIELD. Before the gentleman's amendment is read I desire to say that I reciprocate all his suggestions out of his desire to protect the Treasury against any improper or fraudulent expenditure of the public money.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Now read my amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no payment shall be made until all of the accounts have been audited and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope that amendment will not be allowed to come in, and I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio and the House to it. It requires that all these accounts shall be audited by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury. If that be the case they will require these accounts to be in the form demanded by the United States. Now, it is perfectly well known to every gentleman here that these payments were not made and vouchers received in accordance with the requirements of the War Department. I trust, therefore, that my friend from Illinois will not press his amendment.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The suggestions of the gentleman from Iowa show the eminent propriety of such a provision as this. If the accounts are so loose and worthy of so little attention as seems to have been bestowed upon them it is certainly the duty of the Government to reserve to itself the right of examination and approval.

Mr. ALLISON. Either the gentleman entirely misapprehends what I have said, or he intends by this amendment that this claim of the State of Iowa shall not be paid. I know perfectly well, as does every gentleman from Iowa, that these expenditures were made in the most economical manner by a board of highly respectable gentlemen in our State; but they are not in accordance with the forms required by the War and Treasury Departments, and therefore cannot be paid without some special provision. This bill proposes to make that special provision, and the gentleman from Illinois proposes that they shall go through the ordinary forms of the Treasury Department, which is another way of saying they shall never be paid.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will read one or two sentences from the Commissioner's report:

"My examination of these accounts shows me that they are carefully made up in accordance with the laws of the State, verified on oath, and, though not in the forms used by the Treasury Department, yet sufficiently like them for all practical purposes. I therefore did not attempt to apply to them the regulations of the accounting officers of the Treasury, for had this been possible it did not seem likely that Congress would have provided by law for a commissioner to examine and report upon claims that could have been as well decided upon by those officers themselves. The letters of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Second Comptroller, hereto appended, sanction this opinion."

It seems to me, therefore, if the gentleman offers his amendment in its full force as it now stands, it will merely annul all that has been done by the Commissioner, and in that form I cannot consent to its being offered.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Then the gentleman proposes absolutely that this amount shall be paid without reserving to the Treasury Department the right of revision.

Mr. GARFIELD. No, sir; I do not say that.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. My amendment does not imply more than this, that before payment these claims shall be examined and audited by the United States authorities. I will agree to withdraw the word "audited" and insert "examined and approved."

Mr. GARFIELD. I now yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, I wish, in a few words, to give members of the House a competent idea of this matter. When the hordes of the rebellion crossed the Missouri line into Iowa something had to be done to repel them. The authorities of our State called men from the workshop and the plow, by day and by night, without any enlistment, without any formal regulation of the War Department, to beat back the tide of rebellion. They came when they were called. They had to be armed; they had to be subsisted. The State armed, equipped, and subsisted them. Then before a dollar of this claim was allowed a commission of three gentlemen was appointed by the Legislature to audit the accounts. And, by the way, while I think of it, to show that the commission was not of a partisan character, I will say that two of the three gentlemen belonged to the Democratic party. They audited the account under oath. They sifted it; and there was not a dollar allowed that upon full examination they did not find to be correct and proper, while a good many dollars were disallowed which parties asserted ought to have been paid.

Now, sir, we came here and asked the Government to reimburse the State of Iowa which had paid these accounts as audited by this board. The answer was, "Before we reimburse the State we will send an Army officer as commissioner to see whether the auditing was properly done." Accordingly General Buchanan was sent to Iowa to examine the matter in person. After a thorough examination he reports—and the report is on our tables—that the auditing has been done in accordance with law, but not strictly in accordance with Army regulations, though substantially so. Now, is it necessary to send this account to another auditing officer? It has been audited twice—once by the State commission and once by an authorized officer of the Government—and there is not a dollar in the account that both parties do not say is proper to be paid. We want to be reimbursed a part of the money that the State of Iowa paid in good faith to help put down the rebellion. We do not want anything more. It is a work of supererogation to send this account through a long train of auditing by the different Departments of the Government, and the child may not yet be born that will live to see the day when it shall get through. Two such audits as we have had are enough.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, this claim may be valid and just. I have no doubt the State of Iowa contributed very much toward the crushing of the rebellion, and that she is entitled to recover all she has expended in that case. But I can see no reason why the other States of this Union who contributed as much as Iowa, if not more in some instances, should not have their claims audited and paid as well as that State. Why should the claim of Iowa be preferred to the exclusion of other States? The municipal authorities of the city of New York, in advance of any action of the Federal Government, in advance of the appropriation of a single dollar at Washington, appropriated and actually expended $1,000,000 to raise thirteen volunteer regiments to send on here for the protection of this capital. The city of New York has never been reimbursed one cent by the Federal Government. She has made her application to Congress. The State of New York has made her application. The State of Pennsylvania has already in part received the amount she expended. I cannot, myself, see why the State of Iowa should be preferred over New York and Pennsylvania and other States of the Union whose claims are just as equitable and right. Therefore I feel it my duty to oppose the appropriation of a single dollar of the public money to pay Iowa or any other State until all the States in the Union come in upon an equal footing. When that is done I am willing to vote to allow the whole.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to correct the gentleman's statement. I understand him to say that the State of New York has not been reimbursed.

Mr. WOOD. Not in all.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I have before me a statement of the amounts that have been paid to the States by the General Government. The State of New York has received $2,300,000, the State of Pennsylvania $1,989,000, and the State of Illinois $3,817,000.

Mr. WOOD. I repeat, what I have said before, that these States have not been paid in full, and the city of New York, which expended over a million dollars, has not received the first dollar. The State of New York has disbursed over thirty million dollars in aid of the late war, and issued her bonds, which are yet undecided and unpaid. I repeat that the State of New York, as well as Pennsylvania, has not been paid her demands, which are as just as those of Iowa.

Mr. CULLOM. As I recollect it, nearly every State in the Union that was loyal to the Government at the beginning of the war has been paid the expenses incurred in raising and sending troops to suppress the rebellion. Illinois did it. Iowa did it. New York did it. All the States North did it. After it was done, the Congress of the United States passed the following short bill:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, directed, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to the Governor of any State, or to his duly authorized agents, the costs, charges, and expenses properly incurred by such State for enrolling, subsisting, clothing, supplying, arming, equipping, paying, and transporting its troops employed in aiding to suppress the present insurrection against the United States, to be settled upon proper vouchers, to be filed and passed upon by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury."

After that bill became a law I suppose every northern State presented its claim against the Government for money paid out, and I suppose that every State in the Union received something from the Government on account of expenses incurred by the State in aiding the Government in the suppression of the rebellion. Illinois, as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] has stated, received some. Iowa, according to the same table that he presents, has also received some. New York has received some. But I undertake to say that there is probably no State in the Union that to-day admits that she has received the full amount of money that she is entitled to on account of aid given to the Government in the suppression of the rebellion. All the States have got claims against the Government for money paid out and expended by them in the suppression of the rebellion. Illinois to-day has a claim for several hundred thousand dollars held back by the Government because of the fact that the State of Illinois is unable to show by her vouchers that the claims were regular and were in accordance with the regulations of the War Department. They are not paid. The Legislature of Illinois created a commission, exactly such a commission as the State of Iowa did, and these claims were audited. The commissioners audited a large number of claims that to-day are not allowed by the Government of the United States, and will not be, simply because they were expenses incurred out of the regular line, according to the judgment of the War Department. And now is it to be the action of this House that the State of Iowa shall have its full amount as settled by one man under the dictation, I suspect, of the Governor of the State, saying to him what claims should be allowed and what claims should not, while the State of Illinois and the State of New York and all the other States have got to stand out in the cold and their claims that are irregular are to go unpaid?

Mr. PRICE. Now, that is not a parallel case at all, and the gentleman will observe the point of divergence. The State of Iowa appointed commissioners of her own to examine and audit the accounts, and the State of Illinois did precisely the same thing, according to my friend, who presents the case here. But the General Government was not satisfied with the auditing of the board appointed by the State of Iowa, and they sent their own auditing officer out upon the ground to examine these accounts. He came back and reported that a certain class of these claims are just and proper, and recommended their payment, and it is that class of claims and that amount of money that we come here to-day and ask by this bill to be reimbursed. The only parallel case to this is the case of Missouri. She had similar claims, and an officer was sent out to audit her claims. He reported to Congress, and a bill was introduced and passed this House and became a law allowing the State of Missouri pay for exactly such claims as this. These claims have gone through precisely the same channels. We do not ask for any pay for the State of Iowa, except for claims every dollar of which has been examined by these two commissioners, one on the part of the State and one on the part of the General Government, and reported to this House as eminently proper to be paid.

Mr. BOYER. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. PRICE. For a question.

Mr. BOYER. I desire simply to state that in the case of Pennsylvania there was no bill passed reimbursing that State for any portion of her war expenditures, except in cases in which it was for money advanced to the General Government by the State of Pennsylvania upon a contract, informally made, it is true, but still a contract, with President Lincoln and the Secretary of War, that the money should be refunded. It was for money advanced, and the reimbursement was made upon that ground.

Mr. PRICE. My friend will remember that I was not citing the case of Pennsylvania at all.

Mr. BOYER. But Pennsylvania has been mentioned in this discussion as a State to which reimbursement was made, and therefore I thought it proper to make this explanation.

Mr. PRICE. The State of Pennsylvania has received reimbursements. But I was proceeding to show that the only parallel to this case was the case of Missouri; that the case of Illinois was not a parallel case at all, and cannot be until they have an auditing officer appointed by the Government to go upon the ground and examine those claims. These claims of Iowa cannot be examined any more thoroughly, any more honestly, any more fully, or any more impartially than they have already been examined. Any further examination of this matter would result only in procrastination and keeping the State of Iowa out of money that she honestly expended for the suppression of the rebellion.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. PRICE. For a moment; yes.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I understood the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] to say that the only parallel case was the case of the State of Missouri.

Mr. PRICE. The only parallel case that I cited.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I beg leave to remind the gentleman that a bill has twice passed the Senate in favor of the State of Kansas, providing for the examination of claims for the payment of troops called out for service under Major General Curtis to resist what was known as the Price raid. If there is any justice in this claim on the part of Iowa, there is equal justice in the claim on the part of the State of Kansas.

Mr. PRICE. I ask my friend from Kansas [Mr. CLARKE] whether a commissioner has been appointed by the Government to go to Kansas and examine those claims?

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. Those claims have been referred to a commissioner provided by the Legislature of the State of Kansas. They have been thoroughly examined, and the result of the examination has been submitted to the Treasury Department, and the claims would have been paid had the troops been called out under regular provision of law.

Mr. PRICE. We did all that in Iowa, Mr. Speaker; and after doing all that, we submitted our claims to a Government officer. When Kansas has its claims examined by a Government officer it will have a parallel case, as Missouri now has.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. The accounts of the State of Kansas have been examined at the Treasury Department. As I have already stated, they were not paid on account of some irregularities in calling out the troops. They have been examined at the Treasury Department, and a bill has twice passed the Senate, and is now pending before the Committee on Appropriations. I ask the gentleman having charge of this bill [Mr. GARFIELD] to allow me to offer an amendment, including the claims of the State of Kansas, which stand upon precisely the same basis as the claims of the State of Iowa.

Mr. GARFIELD. I trust the gentleman will see, upon a statement of the case, that the claims of the State of Iowa stand upon a different basis from the claims of the State of Kansas. I will also take advantage of the present occasion to reply to some statements made by gentlemen here. It has been objected by several gentlemen on this floor that it is not fair to single out one State and arrange for paying its claims when there are other States that have just as good claims of the same kind. Now, I ask gentlemen if it is not simply a matter of common sense, in case we are going to pay the claims of States at all, to begin somewhere, with the claims of some one State. We certainly cannot take all the States in a body; no one commission can possibly go over the claims of fifteen or twenty States at once.

The policy of Congress, so far as hitherto exhibited, has been, first, that the claims of each State shall be examined by its own commissioners, or persons appointed by its own Legislature; and then that the Government of the United States shall appoint commissioners to go over the whole matter presented by the State, rejecting what they do not consider proper, and allowing what they do consider proper, submitting the whole matter to Congress for its action. The policy is to settle the claims of these States one by one.

I desire to suggest to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] that if he ever expects to get the claims of the State of New York settled, it is not a good way to do it to object to the settlement of the claims of any other State before his own State has its claims settled. The only way is to take the States as they may be ready for settlement. When a State says that its accounts are so adjusted that it has made a thorough and proper examination and report of its claims, then we can go to work and pass the proper legislation on our part.

When we have examined the subject by a proper board of officers appointed for the purpose, and when that board has reported certain results, it seems to me we have then reached a point where the committees of this House, and the House itself, can review the result of this double examination and act intelligently upon it. Unless we take some such course as that; unless we agree to take up the States in the order in which they present themselves, it seems to me the effect of the arguments made by gentlemen here is that we shall never touch any of them at all.

I grant you, Mr. Speaker, that it is an unpleasant business for a Representative in Congress from the State of Ohio to be voting money out of the Treasury of the United States to be paid to the State of Iowa. It is something for which no Ohio Representative will ever expect to get any special honor or any particularly flattering approval from his constituents. There is, therefore, no appeal to the selfish political interests of members on this floor to advocate or vote for any such bill as this. But it seems to me that if we are intending to do justice to all the States of this Union we must begin somewhere; and the best way is to begin with the States that have their accounts ready for examination.

Now, if we intend ever to pay any accounts of this sort, I know of no such accounts that have been examined more thoroughly, not only by the State itself, but by the Federal authorities, than this claim of the State of Iowa. I understand from my friend from Kansas [Mr. CLARKE] that the accounts of his State have undergone examination by the State authorities. This being so, I suggest to him that his State is in exactly the proper position to ask for the appointment of a Federal commission to go over all that his State has done. When such a commission has made its report, throwing out the claims that it considers improper, and approving those that it considers proper, the claims of that State will be in the same position which the claims of the State of Iowa now occupy before Congress. But until there has been the report of a Federal commission upon the claims of the State of Kansas I cannot see the propriety of putting them in the same category with the claims of the State of Iowa.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. An amendment contemplating such an examination and report is what I desire to offer to this bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. But it is not in place as applied to this bill. Let the gentleman get up a separate bill for the appointment of a commission. That is the proper thing for him to do for his State.

I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON.]

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that gentlemen misapprehend entirely the character of this claim. The State of Iowa does not stand here to-day asking, by this bill, the payment of the class of expenses referred to by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD.] Other States have already received from the General Government reimbursement for the same class of expenses for which the State of Iowa now asks remuneration.

Mr. WOOD. The gentleman will permit me to say that, so far as the city of New York is concerned, her disbursements were for equipments, outfits, provisions, and stores of troops. I am sure that the State of Iowa cannot present a more meritorious claim than that.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not know the character of that particular claim; but I do know that the State of Missouri received some seven million dollars from the Government of the United States upon claims for expenses of precisely the same character as those for which the State of Iowa now asks reimbursement—claims for expenses in raising and supporting troops that were not regularly mustered into the service of the United States. The report in this case shows that two regiments, or parts of regiments, raised in the State of Iowa passed over into the State of Missouri and were actually engaged in suppressing the rebellion; although they were not mustered into the Federal service, and therefore could not receive pay from the War Department. A portion of another regiment was mustered into the service of the State and sent out to the border for the purpose of suppressing Indian hostilities.

The claim of the State of Iowa upon the General Government for reimbursement of these expenses is just as strong as the claims of the State of New York and the State of Pennsylvania in similar cases. I remember perfectly well that three years ago the State of Pennsylvania asked us to pay nearly one million dollars to reimburse that State for the payment of troops called into service for thirty days, but not formally mustered into the service of the United States.

Now that law we ask from the General Government in reference to this claim. It is not a general settlement with the State of Iowa of all the claims she has or may have against the General Government. It is only the adjustment of a particular class of claims, the same class of claims having been adjusted in reference to every other State of the Union that I am aware of. The States of Indiana and Ohio have received payment of the same kind of claims. All that the State of Iowa asks is that she shall be placed upon a par with the other States who have received pay for this kind of expenditures. If the State of Illinois has the same character of expenditures she ought to be paid. So, also, in reference to the State of New York.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Let me ask my friend in regard to this class of expenditures. If the gentleman and the House will look at the special document I hold in my hand, Miscellaneous Document No. 110, they will perceive there is an item of $109,000. For what? To defend the State against the rebels? No, sir; but for the northern border brigade.

Mr. PRICE. Precisely; and I wish to state that the rebels excited the Indians to insurrection and murder, and these troops repelled them.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Does the gentleman come here and state that the State of Iowa had not patriotism enough to repel the Indians, but came here and asked Congress to protect them?

Mr. PRICE. They had patriotism and money enough, and now they ask the Government to refund them the money they expended.

Mr. ALLISON. That expenditure was incurred by the Governor of the State of Iowa, and it was made in the most economical manner. It was incurred for the purpose of suppressing Indian hostilities. Now, I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois whether he proposes that Colorado, Dakota, and the other Territories upon our northwestern border, shall pay the expense of the Indian war now going on? If he does, then this claim ought not to be allowed. If the General Government shall pay that class of claims, why, then, shall the State of Iowa be excluded?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will answer the gentleman. As a Representative in Congress I do not intend to permit Colorado, Dakota, or Iowa, or any other State, to raise troops and make war at the expense of this Government.

The SPEAKER. The five minutes of the gentleman from Iowa have expired.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have promised to yield for five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee. I do not know what he desires.

Mr. MULLINS. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill at the proper time, for the purpose of bringing before Congress the condition of the people of Tennessee. They stand, as far as merit is concerned, as much entitled to receive pay as the State of Iowa, or any other people belonging to the continent of America. I mean so far as the loyal people of the State of Tennessee are concerned, for the other body of her people I am not here representing directly. My amendment goes upon the ground of the bill, as I understood it when it was first presented, that it was to reimburse the State or citizens of the State for any loss incurred growing out of the rebellion, and incurred for the purpose of suppressing it. And furthermore, we ask, if this shall be allowed to the State of Tennessee, that it shall be allowed upon the principles adopted by her Legislature at its last and present session. That legislation prevents any man who was disloyal to the Government, and who incurred loss directly himself or through others by his adherence to the rebellion, from being paid one cent. If such a one comes up to the commissioner authorized by law, by himself or through his friends, it is made a high crime and misdemeanor, for which he is indictable for perjury and liable to a fine of from $100 to $1,000, and imprisoned from one to twenty-one years for presenting his illicit claim. This commission has been appointed by law in Tennessee. It has taken proof of the claims of loyal men in pursuance of law. It has audited those claims. They lie in almost every county of the State. I propose that these claims shall be paid just as those of Iowa. They stand upon the same grounds.

And, while on this subject, I wish every man to understand me. I, for one, hold that every dollar expended by a loyal State ought to be reimbursed by the General Government. The Government ought not to refuse that to the men who have been loyal to it. If the loyal people be denied, then their cry will continue as did the cry from the ground of the blood of Abel against Cain. It will not slumber. And while I sue for the people of Tennessee, understand me, I stand up for the payment of every loyal subject of this country or of any foreign country whose means have been taken or used in the suppression of the rebellion. If he has been loyal to the stars and stripes he ought to be remunerated. I say it will not slumber. You cannot keep it down. The thunders of justice will break down your doors, and the people, in their majesty, will demand that justice shall be done.

I cannot see why any objection should be made. Even the State of Illinois, that makes such a noise about it here, [laughter,] I rejoice to know that her people are right. I want to know whether the Government ever suppressed the Brigham Youngs, who originally stopped there? Or whether, when they engaged in the Black Hawk war, the Government ever lifted them out of the mud and mire? I glory in your spunk, that you stood by the Treasury to pay your honest and just debts, as I believe you fully intended to do.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am delighted and instructed by my friend from Tennessee; but I think he will perceive that I cannot allow his amendment to be offered, precisely for the reason why I declined to allow a similar amendment to be offered by the gentleman from Kansas. I must ask the previous question on the bill and amendment, as the morning hour is almost up, but I will allow further discussion as soon as the previous question is seconded.

Mr. WOOD. I would inquire of the Chair whether, if the previous question is not seconded, it will not be in order to move to recommit the bill, with instructions to report a general bill comprehending all the claims of the States?

The SPEAKER. It will be.

Mr. PRUYN. I have a bill prepared which will cover that ground, and, I think, reconcile these views.

The question being put on seconding the previous question, there were—ayes 48, noes 70.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. WOOD. I now move to recommit the bill with instructions to report a general bill comprehending the claims of all the States of a similar character.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman will permit me to amend the motion by sending the bill to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WOOD. I will accept the modification to refer with instructions to that committee.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Very well; I demand the previous question.

Mr. PRUYN. If the gentleman will allow me—

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask a separate vote on the motion.

Mr. WOOD. I insist on my original motion. I suppose the gentleman was satisfied with his amendment that I accepted?

Mr. PRUYN. If my colleague will allow me, I have prepared, while the discussion has been going on, an amendment to the general bill referred to by the gentleman from Illinois, which I think will cover this whole ground. I ask my colleague to accept an amendment, to recommit, with instructions to amend the act approved July 27, 1861, by adding thereto the following:

But if any such vouchers are not in the form ordinarily in use in the War Department, or do not strictly correspond with the regulations prescribed by or in pursuance of law, the amount of any such vouchers may be allowed and paid on such evidence that they are just and correct as may be satisfactory to the Secretary of the Treasury. This act, and the act hereby amended, shall apply to the city of New York, and to any costs, charges, and expenses incurred by it for any of the objects or purposes above mentioned.

Mr. WOOD. I accept the amendment of my colleague.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired, and the bill goes over till the morning hour of to-morrow.

By unanimous consent the bill and amendments were ordered to be printed, together with the report of the committee.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to proceed to the business on the Speaker's table.

ALLEGED ELECTION FRAUDS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, announced the appointment of the following select committee ordered by the House on alleged election frauds in New York:

Messrs. LAWRENCE of Ohio, DAWES of Massachusetts, BLAIR of Michigan, DICKEY of Pennsylvania, HOPKINS of Wisconsin, MARSHALL of Illinois, and HUBBARD of Connecticut.

COLUMBIAN INSTITUTION.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House a report of the receipts and expenditures of the Columbian Institution for the Deaf and Dumb from June, 1857, to July 1, 1863; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HAMLIN, one of its clerks, announced that that body had directed the return to the House, agreeably to its request, joint resolution of the House (H. R. No. 832) authorizing the appointment of examiners to examine and report upon the expediency of discontinuing the navy-yard at Charlestown, Massachusetts, and uniting the same with the yard at Kittery, Maine.

PENSION AND PATENT OFFICES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting letters from the Commissioner of Pensions and the Commissioner of Patents relative to the need of greater accommodations for their respective offices, and recommending the purchase of a building suitable for the purpose contiguous to the Department; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

DISBURSEMENTS OF WAR DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, relative to the amounts disbursed by that Department from June 30, 1863, to June 30, 1866; which was referred to the Committee on the Expenditures of the War Department, and ordered to be printed.

TARIFF BILL.

Mr. SCHENCK. Before the vote is taken on the motion to go to business on the Speaker's table I desire to state that after consultation with the Committee of Ways and Means I propose to give notice that on the 6th of January I shall move to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the first special order, which is the tariff bill. Considering that to-morrow is likely to be the only day for work this week, inasmuch as there are to be some announcements made on Thursday and Friday, and we shall hardly have a quorum on Saturday, it has been thought advisable not to make a motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on that special order at this time or before the holidays, and I therefore give this notice that all may be prepared. I will yield, however, to my colleague on the committee from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MOORHEAD,] who desires to make another motion.

Mr. MOORHEAD. The gentleman yields time for the purpose of moving to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the tariff bill. The bill has been before the country for some time. It is printed, and it was before the House last session, and it was agreed upon that it would be the first thing in order in Committee of the Whole, and would be taken up whenever we could get into Committee of the Whole. I am satisfied the country expects us to act upon the bill, and I was in hopes we could pass it through before the holidays. I therefore make the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am perfectly willing that the sense of the House shall be taken on that motion.

Mr. BROOKS. For the purpose of understanding this matter, with the consent of the gentleman from Ohio, let me ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania what bill he expects to bring up in Committee of the Whole; whether it be the short bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means last session and now in Committee of the Whole, or whether it be the very long bill of which he had custody in the Committee of Ways and Means as a subcommittee?

Mr. MOORHEAD. I would inform the gentleman that my motion is to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The short bill, as he styles it, is the bill that is pending in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and of course we shall take up that bill. That is my motion, and that is my expectation.

Mr. BROOKS. Does the gentleman propose to take it up for action before the recess?

Mr. MOORHEAD. To take it up at once for debate and amendment.

Mr. BROOKS. I hope that will not be done. There are so many interests concerned in the tariff and connected with the tariff that while an announcement is very proper of what is intended to be done in regard to it after the holidays, it would be very improper, in the present unprepared state of the country, to take up the tariff bill now and act upon it without any consultation with our constituents, when those constituents have forgotten the bill and all the details of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the condition of the bill. The short tariff bill, as it is called, was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. When the House was last in Committee of the Whole, before the adjournment in July, upon motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MOORHEAD,] various bills anterior to it were laid aside one by one; the bill was finally reached, and the first paragraph was read for amendment. That is the condition of the bill.

The question was taken on Mr. MOORHEAD's motion; and there were—ayes 60, noes 54.

Mr. ALLISON called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. MOORHEAD and BROOKS were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 77, noes 55.

Mr. ROSS demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 104, nays 69, not voting 48; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Banks, Beaman, Beatty, Benton, Bingham, Blaine, Blair, Boutwell, Bowen, Boyden, Boyer, Broomall, Buckley, Roderick B. Butler, Cake, Callis, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Corley, Covode, Dawes, Deweese, Dickey, Dixon, Dockery, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eia, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, French, Garfield, Getz, Halsey, Haughey, Heaton, Higby, Chester D. Hubbard, Halburd, Jones, Alexander H. Jones, Kelley, Ketcham, Kitcher, Koontz, Lash, George V. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Whittemore, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—104.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Allison, Anderson, Archer, Axtell, Baker, Barnes, Barnum, Beck, Bromwell, Brooks, Burr, Benjamin F. Trimble, Van Aernum, Van Trump, Van Wyck, William Williams, James F. Wilson, Wood, Woodward, and Young—59.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Delos K. Ashley, Baldwin, Benjamin, Blackburn, Boles, Buckland, Critt, Cornell, Dolano, Dodge, Edwards, Eldridge, Elliot, Fox, Goss, Gove, Griswold, Haight, Hamilton, Harding, Hawkins, Hill, Asahel W. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Kellogg, Kelsey, Lullin, Logan, McCormick, Nicholson, Nunn, Paine, Pierce, Pooley, Pomeroy, Raum, Root, Sawyer, Shanks, Shellabarger, Thomas, Jean Trimble, Van Auken, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Thomas Williams, and Woodbridge—48.

So the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. DAWES in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the House bill No. 1349, to increase the revenue from duties on imports, and tending to equalize exports and imports.

The following paragraph of the bill was under consideration:

That from and after the passage of this act, in lieu of the duties heretofore imposed by law on the articles hereinafter mentioned, there shall be levied, collected, and paid on the articles herein enumerated and provided for, imported from foreign countries, the following specified duties and rates of duty, to wit: say: on all copper imported in the form of ores, three cents on each pound of fine copper contained therein; on all regulus of copper, and on all black or coarse copper, four cents on each pound of fine copper contained therein; on all old copper fit only for remanufacture, four cents per pound; on all copper in plates, bars, ingots, pigs, and in other forms not manufactured or herein enumerated, five cents per pound.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BROOKS] is entitled to the floor for the remainder of his hour, ten minutes of his time having been occupied by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] when this bill was last under consideration.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORHEAD] has been omnipotent in this House in arresting all other business, and securing a monopoly of legislation for his own State. No matter what may be the public necessities, no matter what great interests of the country press upon the attention of Congress, Pennsylvania appears here and demands instant attention to her own particular interests, as set forth in the bill now before this committee.

Now, I am not prepared at this time for this discussion. Not expecting the bill to come up to-day I have not here the material necessary for stating properly my views upon this subject, which I had collected at the time the session closed in July last. But if I am pressed to do it, I suppose I shall have to go on, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MOORHEAD,] however courteous he may be in regard to other matters, is most certain to be discourteous in regard to those particular matters in which Pennsylvania is interested.

Before I go any further, I would like to know if the Chair will sustain a point of order which I will raise. The honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] introduced yesterday a resolution, the seeming object of which was to oust six anti-tariff members of Congress from the city and suburbs of New York. The point I desire to make is, that the gentleman from Ohio, in collusion with the gentleman from Pennsylvania—I mean nothing offensive by that statement—is seeking to disfranchise the great city of New York and its people, and to drive out of this House six anti-tariff members. And I wish to proceed to discuss that question rather than the bill now before us; and to show that that ought not to be done, and cannot be done in the manner proposed by the honorable gentleman from Ohio, I submit to the decision of the Chair the question whether, under precedents established in this House, such latitude of discussion will be allowed in Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can make no ruling in advance. If any remarks submitted by the gentleman should be objected to by any member, as out of order, the Chair will then rule upon the question.

Mr. BROOKS. My impression is that in the Committee of the Whole I am justified by the practice in discussing almost anything. Therefore I proceed to say that "money is the root of all evil"—not an original remark, to be sure; but money is the root of the evil in the proposition of the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MOORHEAD,] and in the allied proposition of the honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE.]

Mr. MULLINS. I rise to correct the gentleman from New York. The proper quotation is, "the love of money is the root of all evil." [Laughter.]

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, one of the great means of corrupting the public mind and of corrupting popular elections is money, and money is obtained by monopolies; and the monopoly of the tariff, giving bounties of thirty, forty, fifty, or one hundred per cent., is the most dangerous and mischievous of all monopolies. Underlying all the frauds and corruptions in elections is always money; and when I say that nearly or quite five hundred thousand dollars, as I think will be established by an investigation of this matter, was contributed by the Union League of the city of New York, in collusion with the Union League of the city of Philadelphia—these organizations being made up mainly of iron men and steel men, I mean steel, not steal, for the latter expression might be offensive—to corrupt the elections and to carry the State of Indiana and the State of Ohio, as well as the State of Pennsylvania, and more than all, to carry the naturally anti-tariff State of Maine, as well as other States, I utter a fact too well known to the people of New York and the people of the city of Philadelphia, where these contributions were made in immense sums. I have a partial list here before me which I could read at some length, but it is unnecessary.

But before I proceed to the discussion of that question, I wish to proclaim to the country that the grand jury of the city of New York has had under examination the subject of the corruptions practiced by these Union Leagues of Philadelphia and New York, and has prepared a paper subjecting to indictment some men whose names are among the most eminent in this country. Let me add further, that an honorable Senator from my own State, who has contributed immense sums of money to carry the State of New York, if not other States, introduced yesterday in the Senate a proposition corresponding with that of the honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] but not calling for the appointment of a committee. Yet that honorable Senator, when summoned before the grand jury of New York to appear and give testimony which would show the immense sums of money he had contributed, twice refused to answer to the process of the court, and only escaped testifying by leaving the city, or by availing himself of his privilege as a member of Congress.

Mr. MYERS. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. BROOKS. I prefer not to be interrupted.

Mr. MYERS. I would like to ask the gentleman whether the Senator to whom he refers is one of the three New York State senators who voted in Philadelphia last October?

Mr. BROOKS. Sir, another gentleman who has contributed immense sums of money to carry these elections is a prominent member of one of the largest dry-goods houses.

Mr. MYERS. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. BROOKS. Oh, I expected that I should be offensive to the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. MYERS. I just now asked the gentleman from New York, who has been allowed a large latitude of discussion, whether the Senator—

Mr. RANDALL. That is not a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. MYERS. My point of order is that the gentleman from New York is not discussing the question before the committee. As the gentleman refuses to answer questions in relation to the matter that he is bringing before the House, I clearly have the right to confine him to the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not find that this bill has been made a special order in committee, and therefore more latitude of debate is allowed than otherwise would be.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I think the Chair has not examined the record.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be corrected; but on examination at the Clerk's desk he is so informed. His recollection is, that this bill was taken up by laying aside all the bills preceding it.

Mr. MOORHEAD. That was the case; but in reply to an inquiry I made of the Speaker before the House adjourned he said this was a special order in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. It is proper, therefore, that the discussion should be confined to the bill. I do not wish to cut off discussion of the bill itself. I would be glad to have legitimate discussion; but when I find gentlemen are disposed to ramble into general politics, as my eloquent friend from New York has done, I shall insist that they shall be confined to the bill.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The gentleman is stating no point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is stating his recollection of the record.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Let us have the record read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed, from the Clerk's desk, there is no record that it is a special order, and the gentleman from New York will therefore proceed.

Mr. BROOKS. At the head of the committee of investigation of the Union League of New York appears the name of William E. Dodge, a gentleman well known upon this floor, who procured from Geoghegan a certain amount of testimony which took me off the floor of the House and installed him here as Representative of a district which subsequently sent me back by near six thousand majority, and sent me back again by a majority approximating twelve thousand.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is unable to see any pertinency in these remarks to what is before the committee.

Mr. BROOKS. I hope the courtesy of the House will indulge me at some future time. I did not expect to get further than an honorable Senator. I expected to be stopped here; but I have much richer testimony, which I hope, in the course of human events, to get before the House. The indictment of that grand jury will show some of the richest election developments of the country.

Mr. BROOKS then proceeded to discuss the tariff. [See Appendix.]

Mr. WOOD. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. DAWES reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 1349) to increase the revenue from duties on imports and tending to equalize exports and imports, had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I move that the House again resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the bill (H. R. No. 1349); and, pending that motion, I move that debate on the pending paragraph be limited to one hour.

Mr. WOOD. I hope the gentleman will not press his motion at this time. There is important business before the House which should be disposed of to-day, as it is understood tomorrow will be the last day for business before the holidays.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 55, noes 66.

So the House refused to close debate.

Mr. MOORHEAD demanded the yeas and nays on the motion to go into committee.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 93, nays 64, not voting 64; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James M. Ashley, Bailey, Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Benton, Bingham, Blaine, Blair, Boutwell, Boyden, Broomall, Buckland, Roderick R. Butler, Calkins, Churchill, Cobb, Corley, Covodo, Dawes, Dewesse, Dickey, Dixon, Dockery, Driggs, Eckley, Edwards, Ela, Ferriss, Ferry, French, Goss, Gove, Griswold, Halsey, Haughey, Heaton, Higby, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburt, Hunter, Jeuckes, Alexander H. Jones, Kelley, Kellogg, Kelsey, Ketchum, Koontz, Lash, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loughridge, Lynch, Marvin, Maynard, McCarthy, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrell, Mullins, Myers, Newsham, Norris, O'Neill, Pettis, Plants, Poland, Price, Randall, Raum, Robertson, Scofield, Selye, Shanks, Spaulding, Starkweather, Stevens, Taylor, Tiowbridge, Twichell, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Whittemore, William Williams, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Woodbridge—93.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, Axtell, Blackburn, Boies, Bowen, Bromwell, Buckland, Benjamin F. Butler, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Coburn, Cornell, Delano, Dodge, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fields, Fox, Garfield, Gravelly, Haight, Hamilton, Harding, Hill, Asabel W. Hubbard, Lugersoll, Ladin, Lincoln, Logan, McKee, Morrissey, Mungen, Nicholson, Numan, Paine, Peters, Pierce, Polesley, Pomroy, Prince, Robinson, Roots, Sawyer, Shellabarger, Smith, Stokes, Sypher, Taffe, Thomas, John Trimble, Upson, Van Aernam, Van Auker, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Vidal, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Thomas Williams, and Windom—64.

So the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. DAWES in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the tariff bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Globe discloses the fact that on the 13th of July last, when this bill was under consideration in the House, the debate was closed in two hours.

The first paragraph of the bill was read, as follows:

That from and after the passage of this act, in lieu of the duties heretofore imposed by law on the articles hereinafter mentioned, there shall be levied, collected, and paid on the articles herein enumerated and provided for, imported from foreign countries, the following specified duties and rates of duty, that is to say: on all copper imported in the form of ores, three cents on each pound of fine copper contained therein; on all regulus of copper, and on all black or coarse copper, four cents on each pound of fine copper contained therein; on all old copper fit only for remanufacture, four cents per pound; on all copper in plates, bars, ingots, pigs, and in other forms not manufactured or herein enumerated, five cents per pound.

No amendment being offered, the Clerk read the next paragraph, as follows:

On copper, in plates, sheets, rods, pipes, and copper bottoms, and all manufactures of copper, or of which copper shall be a component material of chief value, not otherwise herein provided for, forty-five per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move to insert, after the word "value," the words "blue vitriol or sulphate of copper." The committee will observe that upon "all manufactures of copper or of which copper shall be a component material of chief value, not otherwise herein provided," the tax is increased to forty-five per cent. ad valorem. Now, blue vitriol or sulphate of copper is composed, of course, of copper, and copper is its chief value. But it being provided for under the head of chemicals the duty has not been raised. The present tariff is twenty-five per cent. on that article. We have some manufacturers of it who are just able to live now, and if you raise the price of copper three or five cents per pound it simply wipes out these manufactures. Now, as you increase the tariff on copper you should also increase the tariff on the salts of copper, as the copper constitutes their chief value. I therefore move to insert these articles, so as to equalize the tariff on them.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PIKE. I move to amend the paragraph by striking out forty-five and inserting twenty per cent. I submit to the committee that this mode of arranging a tariff bill is not fair to the various interests of the country. Now that the election has gone by it would seem to be a fit and appropriate time to arrange a tariff with reference to all the great interests of the country. But instead of that, to my very great surprise, I find that these small tariff bills, which were introduced at the last session apparently for the purpose of bridging over the election in various localities to which they would particularly apply, are brought in here apparently with the sanction of the Committee of Ways and Means as serious projects on which to arrange the business of this country. Now, I ask the committee, is it fair to the great interests of the country which use this copper to assess a higher tariff upon copper for the purpose of raising its price, so as to charge those who use it an additional amount? I am entirely willing that this House, upon a fair consideration, should take the great interests of the consumers and of the manufacturers of copper, and arrange them upon an equitable basis. I am entirely willing to take an interest that I represent in part, but only in part, upon this floor—the ship-building interest, which is a large consumer of copper; but I ask the committee to say whether it is prepared now to punish that interest by an additional assessment of twenty per cent. for the benefit of a producing interest in another section of the country? Is it fair thus to attack a large and valuable national interest like that of ship-building? I need not comment upon its large importance. We have had it and discussed it repeatedly on this floor; and the Secretary of the Treasury in every report for three years past has not failed to lament the decadence of the great ship-building interest of this country as a great national misfortune. It is the only great manufacturing interest in the whole length and breadth of the country that was cut down by the war, the other great interests being stimulated thereby into unusual activity, so that they came out prosperous at its close, and are to-day vastly richer in all quarters of the country than they were before the war. But here is an interest that is struck at by this provision under the sanction of the Committee of Ways and Means. I ask them if they have considered what is to be the effect upon the consumers of this article? Now, I am not prepared to say what amount of copper this ship-building interest consumes, but it was stated upon the floor of the Senate by a Senator from Michigan, in a discussion in the month of June last, that one half of the copper product of this country went into shipbuilding. I am not prepared to say whether that statement is correct or not, but if it be correct then the proposition in the pending paragraph in this bill is to assess upon the consumers of copper in ship-building one half the enhanced price of copper in this country.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to say a word in reply to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PIKE.] It will be seen, by comparing the article of copper with various other articles, that the duty on copper is very much less than the general average on imported articles. The reason of that has been that the copper interest of this country, relying upon the supposed facility with which copper could be procured, especially from what I may call the native ores of Lake Superior, have not claimed that amount of protection which some other interests require. The duty at present is thirty-five per cent., and this bill proposes to raise it ten per cent. ad valorem. The copper interest in this country ought to supply all the metal that would be wanted for ship-building or for any other purpose. Not only the copper mines of Lake Superior, but those of Virginia, Tennessee, and California, are wrought and have demonstrated a capacity of being wrought with great success. The competition that they meet with is from the ore that is brought in in ballast from Chili and from Cuba, and mainly from these two points.

I will not go over with the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] the theory of protection, because, if he agrees with me, it is unnecessary, and if he does not agree with me it is equally unnecessary. I do not admit that the raising of the tariff so far as is necessary to keep alive and in active operation our own establishments here at home will raise the price of copper to the ship-builders of Maine or to the mechanics in any other part of the country, or in any kind of employment. This provision of the bill is predicated upon the necessity deemed to exist and ascertained, after careful examination, of this amount of protection against foreign ore to keep alive and in active operation the copper-producing interests of our own country.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question was taken on Mr. PIKE's amendment; and it was disagreed to—ayes thirty-one, noes not counted.

Mr. PHELPS. I move to add to the paragraph the following:

Provided, That if any person, corporation, company, or partnership engaged in the business of smelting copper ores shall import any foreign copper ores into the United States, and shall, in making such importation, file with the collector of the port into which such copper ores were imported a bond with security, to be approved by the collector of said port into which said ores are imported, to use two tons of copper ores mined in the United States to one ton of said imported ores in the smelting of copper, such person, corporation, company, or partnership shall be entitled to a drawback upon the foreign copper ores so imported to the extent of the duty paid thereon: Provided, Said person, corporation, company, or partnership shall furnish evidence, under regulations to be established by the Secretary of the Treasury, that he, it, or they has or have used said copper ores so imported, and also copper ores mined in the United States in his, its, or their business in the proportion of two tons of copper ores mined in the United States to one ton of imported copper ores.

Mr. Chairman, the committee will bear in mind that the paragraph which stands as the first paragraph of this bill has already, so far as the action of this House is concerned, become a law. It was taken out from the general bill and made a separate bill by itself, and in that form was passed. It will be further recollected that under the circumstances under which that bill was introduced, and under the pressure of the previous question was hurried to its passage, no opportunity was given to introduce this amendment or any other. It is absolutely indispensable for the proper protection of the domestic mining of copper as well as the domestic smelting companies that this proviso should accompany the increased tariff on copper ores. It is not, as might be supposed by many at first sight, and as all who are unacquainted with the subject are apt to imagine, a measure simply for the protection of domestic miners against foreign ones. There is but one copper mining interest in this country that is so protected, and that is the Lake Superior mining interest. An extravagant bounty is given to that interest at the expense of all the other copper mining interests of the country, which are very largely represented in Vermont, in New Jersey, in Maryland, and in California. It is indispensable, for the proper manipulation of the copper ores produced in those States and in other States, that a certain proportion of Chilean and Cuban ores under the name of carbonates should be used in the process of smelting. Without the infusion of those carbonates the reduction of the native ores or sulphurets is an expensive, complicated, and tedious process, and would not justify the cost. But with the introduction of these foreign carbonates, in the proportion of one ton of the foreign ores to two tons of the domestic, the process is materially simplified. Indeed, without them it is impossible to sustain the smelting or the mining interests of the seaboard States. We therefore protest against this special legislation in favor of one branch of the great copper mining interests of this country to the detriment and probable ruin of other branches of the same interests. We protest against the raising of the tariff on copper ores, which are indispensably necessary as admixtures for the proper working of domestic ores, unless it be accompanied by the enactment of a provision such as that which I have sent to the Chair, and which, in the shape of a drawback on those ores used in the domestic manufacture, will give that amount of bounty on the domestic mines necessary to compensate them for the disadvantage which the States I have referred to will suffer by this competing monopoly of Lake Superior.

I regret that the separation of this paragraph relating to copper ores from the balance of the bill, and its passage as a separate bill under the operation of the previous question, without any opportunity for amendment, has made it necessary to offer this amendment by way of proviso to this bill. But, regarding the tariff as substantially raised upon copper ores, so far as the action of this House is concerned, I think it is well that this House should act upon the matter in the shape I have presented.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to state to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] that Pennsylvania has no special copper interest to subserve. But, in connection with what has been said by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. PHELPS,] I want to make the suggestion that the changes proposed by this bill are just what are required by the interests which he says he deems this bill a blow at. The Lake Superior interests are suffering, as my friend from Michigan [Mr. DRIGGS] will tell you. But there are other copper interests in the country which require development, and which, if developed, will give ores, the equivalent of the foreign copper ores which are now required to be mixed with those from Lake Superior. Virginia has no voice upon this floor, or she would appeal to Congress for the development of her copper regions. Tennessee abounds as richly as Michigan in copper; those ores are diffused all over the eastern part of the State. Yet there is not protection enough in the tariff to develop them. Alabama has varieties of copper ores. Yet there is not capital enough there or inducement enough in our tariff to lead capital enough there to develop them. Our tariff, as it now stands, increases the price of copper, because there is not sufficient development of our native resources in that respect. Pass this bill, and the capital and energy of the North will go into Virginia, the capital which is already in Tennessee will be brought into play, and the copper of Alabama will rival all the other copper of the country in the market. We will have from our own mines every variety of ores we need for making the admixture referred to by the gentleman from Maryland. I hope, therefore, that if we do not adopt this provision, we will, in the interest of other industries, take off that which, while it is a tax, affords no protection to the capital invested in copper mining and no stimulant to the development of our widely diversified copper regions.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the amendment.

Mr. DRIGGS. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last two lines. First, in reply to my friend from the State of Maine, [Mr. PIKE,] who asks whether it is fair to give further protection to copper to the detriment of the shipping interests of his State, allow me to say that it is fair that copper, which now has only from five to seven per cent. protection, should have a protection somewhat in keeping with that afforded to other articles.

Mr. PIKE. It now has a protection of thirty-five per cent.

Mr. DRIGGS. The article has now not over seven per cent., the article being worth in the market about twenty-three cents per pound, and the present tariff being three cents per pound.

Mr. PIKE. That is the tariff on the ore.

Mr. DRIGGS. I know of what I am speaking. I mean the pure copper in the ore. The duty is now but three or four cents per pound, and all we ask in this bill is a duty of five cents. This bill proposes to impose a specific duty of five cents per pound on pure copper contained in the ore. The article is worth in the market about twenty-three cents per pound.

I desire to state to the House, and members may rely upon the correctness of my information on this point, that of about one hundred mines in the Lake Superior region there are only about eleven now being worked; and the reason is that they have to pay on the iron and steel that they use in their drills and other machinery about fifty per cent., while the duty on copper is only about seven per cent. I should like to know how gentlemen can pretend that there is anything fair in such a discrimination against an important American interest. We ask a duty of only about twenty-two per cent. We are in favor of duties upon other articles requiring protection, but we do not think there is any justice in the present low duty on copper, nor does this House think so, judging by the vote the other day on the special bill upon this subject.

My friend from Maryland [Mr. PHELPS] feels an interest in the smelting works at Baltimore, and it is proper enough that he should defend the interests of his constituency; but I would say to him that if that particular branch of industry cannot live without crushing important American interests the persons concerned in it had better find some other business. The gentleman desires that a drawback shall be allowed upon every ton of imported copper mixed with two tons of American ore, thus practically bringing in the foreign copper free. Of the twelve thousand tons consumed in 1865 but three thousand were imported, the Lake Superior region producing nearly nine thousand tons. With the small protection now proposed—only about one half that given to many other articles of American production—the Lake Superior mines can produce all the copper that is needed in the country, saying nothing about the production in other States, of which my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] has spoken. My friend from New Mexico [Mr. CLEVER] represents a district of country rivaling the Lake Superior region in reference to the production of this metal. Hence, the duty proposed in this bill is for the protection, not of the Lake Superior region alone, but of the copper interest throughout the United States. This bill, going further than the measure already passed, proposes to give protection to manufactured copper. We have no objection to that or to any other just provision of the bill.

I desire to make a single additional remark, that the copper of South America is produced very cheaply by peon labor, and should not be permitted to come into ruinous competition with that produced by the free labor of this country.

Mr. TWICHELL. I offer as a substitute for the pending amendment the following:

Add at the end of the paragraph these words: Provided, That copper used in the manufacture of vessels shall be admitted free of duty.

I trust that this amendment will be satisfactory to the Representatives from Michigan as well as those from Maine.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment just offered, and in doing so I wish to make a few general remarks upon the subject of copper.

The Committee of Ways and Means found considerable difficulty in adjusting this question so as to please at the same time the Michigan copper miners and the manufacturers of copper in the East; but I am very clear in my recollection that when the question was before the committee last summer it was shown that the increase of the duty on copper ore, as provided for in this bill, would not affect in any way the manufacturer of copper. In other words, it was shown before the committee that there was no manufactured copper imported into this country; that those gentlemen in Baltimore and in other sections of the Union who manufacture copper have an entire monopoly of this business.

Now, the proposition is to increase the duty upon the manufactured copper ten per cent. ad valorem, and they offer as an excuse for that that we have increased the duty upon copper ore. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that this increase of duty, even if the first paragraph of this bill is permitted to become law, will not have the effect in any way to retard the manufacturers of copper in this country, for they have now absolutely the monopoly of this manufacture. The only effect of this will be to vote this much more into the pockets of the men who manufacture copper, and to take this much out of the pockets of the men who consume copper in ship-building or any other business. I maintain, sir, there is no necessity for this increase of duty upon the manufactured article. Certainly we have heard no good reason urged for it so far in this debate.

Now, with reference to the drawback on copper used in ship-building, I know of no reason why a shipbuilder should have drawback any more than any consumers of copper in my country in the shape of copper wire and copper coil. That is all I have to say on that point.

One word more in reference to the general subject of this bill. I regret that this tariff bill has been brought before us prematurely rather than have followed the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, that the whole subject should be postponed until the 6th of January next, when the report of the Secretary of the Treasury could be examined by the House. Then we might have had an opportunity of devising anew this bill, increasing duties upon articles not embraced in this bill, and reducing them upon articles which now have too much.

Mr. TWICHELL's amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland by striking out the last two lines.

Mr. Chairman, the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland is substantially to allow smelters to import duty free one ton of foreign copper ore on condition that they use two tons of native ore in connection with it. I see no necessity for such a provision, for we have sufficient native ore for all smelting purposes. The argument is made that it is necessary to have some part of foreign ore as a flux for the native ore. That is sufficiently answered by the smelting operations in my own State and in my own district. There the ore is smelted, and smelted successfully, using the native ore alone. It is successfully carried on there, and can be everywhere else without the importation of foreign ore. The introduction of copper ore from Cuba and Chili only serves to come into competition with the production of our own mines. I trust, therefore, the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland will not be adopted, as it is in direct contravention of the principle of this bill, which is to develop our material resources. We should not encourage the principle contemplated by this amendment of bringing in copper free of duty from foreign ports.

Mr. PHELPS. Is it not the fact that this amendment, by admitting one ton of copper ore from abroad free of duty on condition of its being used with two tons of native copper ore will stimulate the production of native ore?

Mr. MAYNARD. I do not so understand it. The proper encouragement to the domestic mines would be to have the three tons of native ore and not one of foreign to two of native ore. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. PIKE. I renew the amendment for the purpose of making a single remark. The gentleman from Tennessee, in reply to the gentleman from Iowa, indicated that the raising of the tariff would not have the effect to raise the price now. The manufacturers of copper come before the Committee of Ways and Means and solicit an additional percentage of ten per cent. to be put in this bill; still they do not propose it for the purpose of raising the tariff on manufactured copper! Can the gentleman tell me what the object is of protecting the manufacturers of copper? They come to the House and solicit additional percentage, and still the gentleman from Tennessee says to the gentleman from Iowa it has not the effect of raising the price! Why, what do these manufacturers of copper want? Do they want a diminished price? If they do, that is something within their own power without any act of Congress.

Mr. MAYNARD. I think the gentleman misapprehended the point of my colleague on the committee. He was not stating a principle of political economy, but giving out what he supposed to be the fact, in which, however, I do not coincide with him, that all the manufactured copper used in this country was the home product.

Mr. ALLISON. I will only say I had before me the report of the Secretary of the Treasury showing that we do not import any manufactured copper.

Mr. PIKE. I do not wish to discuss political economy, but I certainly understood the gentleman from Tennessee to say that raising the duty would not raise the price. And that view was enforced by the impressive manner and exceedingly eloquent sentences of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] who insisted that the effect of an increased tariff is not to enhance prices. The consumers of iron and copper are told that by increasing the tariff they do not thereby have to pay an increased price for those articles. Now, sir, I have been something of a tariff man in my day, and I am to-day a tariff man, and I vote for a tariff for the purpose of increasing the price. I supposed that was one object of the tariff. I see one of the leading manufacturers of Pennsylvania, [Mr. MORRELL,] giving me his attention. I think he agrees with me that we want an additional tariff on iron for the purpose of increasing the price. He either wants it for one purpose or the other—for the purpose of increasing the price or diminishing it. If he wants it for the purpose of diminishing it, I suggest to him that he does not need our assistance. He can diminish the price any day by the tariff of prices. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SPALDING. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the proviso and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

Provided, That copper in any form, used in ship-building, and actually imported into the United States for that purpose, shall be entitled to a drawback of twenty per cent. ad valorem.

I am in favor of protecting the copper interest, but I do not wish to discourage ship-building. I think this is a fair proposition for a compromise between those two interests. It still leaves upon imported copper sheeting a duty of twenty-five per cent. If they do import it for the purpose of using it in ship-building let them have a drawback of twenty per cent. which will leave the duty twenty-five per cent. to be paid. I think that ought to satisfy both interests.

Mr. DRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SPALDING. It is getting rather late, and I want a vote on my amendment.

Mr. DRIGGS. I wish to ask the gentleman if that will not be a drawback for about all the duty imposed by this bill, which is about twenty-two per cent.?

Mr. SPALDING. No, sir; it is forty-five per cent. ad valorem, and my amendment leaves it twenty-five per cent.

Mr. KELLEY. There is much said about oppressing the shipping interest by the protection given to the copper interest. I want to say that if the shipping interest of the country will give to the owners of the copper fields the same monopoly which the ship-owners now have without any tariff they will be satisfied. The law secures to American shipping a monopoly, not by a prohibitory tariff, but an absolute monopoly of the coasting trade and river trade of the country. It is greater than all the foreign commerce of the world. There never was such a monopoly. I approve it, and I am willing to go further. I am willing, as the gentleman from Maine knows, to remove all tonnage duties from our internal trade, and stimulate and develop by every means our internal commerce.

Mr. PIKE. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. KELLEY. I have but five minutes, as you said to other gentlemen who interrupted you. Do not let that interest which is protected by the most absolute and grandest monopoly the United States Government ever conceded to any interest come here and cry out against the copper interest of Lake Superior, Virginia, North Carolina, Alabama, and Tennessee, and ask to crush them all.

Mr. PIKE. The gentleman is astray in his figures.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the amendment to the amendment is exhausted.

The question being put on the amendment of Mr. SPALDING, there were—ayes 26, noes 41; no quorum voting.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DAVES reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 1349) to increase the revenue from duties on imports and tending to equalize exports and imports, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

And then, on motion of Mr. ALLISON, (at three o'clock and fifty-seven minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Interior, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 14th instant, the report of Jesse L. Williams, esq., Government director of the Union Pacific railroad, on the condition of that railroad; which, on motion of Mr. CONNESS, was referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a memorial of the Universal Peace Union, praying the adoption of humane measures in the treatment of the Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. WARNER presented a petition of nineteen members of the Alabama Legislature, praying for the establishment of a land office at Gadsden, Alabama; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. POMEROY presented the petition of citizens of Indiana, praying that in any amendment of the Constitution to extend or regulate suffrage there be no distinction between men and women; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print fifteen hundred additional copies of the report of the Columbian Institution for the Deaf and Dumb for the use of the institution, reported it without amendment; and the resolution was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Superintendent of Public Printing be, and he is hereby, authorized to print fifteen hundred copies of the report of the Columbian Institution for the Deaf and Dumb, with its appendix, for the use of the institution.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1460) regulating the duties on imported copper and copper ores, reported it without amendment.

PAYMENT OF FIVE-TWENTY BONDS—SPECIE.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Finance to report a resolution, which I send to the desk to be read.

The resolution was read, as follows :

Resolved by the Senate. That neither public policy nor the good faith of the nation will allow the redemption of the five-twenty bonds until the United States shall perform its primary duty of paying its notes in coin or making them equivalent thereto; and measures should be adopted by Congress to secure the resumption of specie payments at as early a period as practicable.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am also directed by the same committee to report back Senate joint resolution No. 66, pledging the faith of the United States for the payment of the public debt in coin or its equivalent, introduced at the first session of the present Congress and referred to the committee, with a recommendation that it lie on the table, as the view of the committee is embraced in the resolution already reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will lie on the table if there be no objection.

Mr. POMEROY. Do the committee recommend the passage of the resolution first read?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; and I should like to have the resolution passed now if the Senate is ready for it; but I supposed it was a subject that would excite debate, and therefore I simply reported it that it might take its place on the Calendar.

Mr. POMEROY. I thought the Senator moved that it lie on the table, and I did not understand the meaning of that.

Mr. SHERMAN. It goes on the Calendar to take its place, and I will call it up at the first moment I can do so, to get the sense of the Senate on it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is a report of a committee not acted on when made, and of course takes its place on the Calendar.

MONUMENT TO GENERAL KEARNY.

Mr. WILSON. The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 375) donating condemned cannon for the erection of a monument to Major General Kearny, have instructed me to report it back and recommend its passage. I ask that the resolution be put on its passage at this time. I am sure there will be no objection to it.

By unanimous consent the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is an authorization to the Secretary of War to furnish such condemned iron cannon as may be required, not exceeding four, for the completion of a monument at Tivoli, New York, over the remains of the late Major General Philip Kearny and other Union soldiers buried at that place, who lost their lives in the late war.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DISCHARGE OF CRIMINALS IN VIRGINIA.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved. That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the necessity and practicability of some immediate legislation to prevent the discharge of persons convicted of crime from imprisonment by the extraordinary decisions of the United States district judge of Virginia.

No objection being made, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. FERRY. I suggest to the Senator that he had better strike out the word "extraordinary."

Mr. WILLIAMS. No, sir; I think it might be made stronger.

Mr. FERRY. I move, then, that the word "extraordinary" be stricken out. I have no objection to this inquiry, but I think an imputation ought not to be cast upon the judge in this manner.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not very particular as to the phraseology of the resolution; but it seems to me that the word "extraordinary" is not misplaced, and that the decisions referred to might be characterized in stronger terms without any violation of propriety or right. I have read some of those decisions, and they proceed upon the ground that a person convicted before a judge who is not properly qualified may be discharged from the judgment of conviction, because the proceedings are void, which is entirely in conflict with all decisions that I have ever read or heard of upon the subject. I have always understood that the proceedings before a judge de facto, if he was not properly qualified, were valid as between the litigants, particularly when they are collaterally assailed.

Now, in this matter, so far as the conviction of persons in Virginia is concerned, it is alleged that the judges who are holding the offices there, some of them, if not all of them, are not qualified according to the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution; that is, they have not taken some oath or that they do not possess some qualification prescribed by that amendment, notwithstanding they are judges de facto and have been acting as judges, and some hundreds of persons, I believe, have been convicted of crime in the courts held by them. If the decision of the United States district judge is sustained the prison doors of that State or Territory, whatever it may be, are to be opened and all prisoners convicted before these de facto judges are to be discharged. I have never heard of any precedent for any such proceedings; and therefore I characterize them as extraordinary, because they are extraordinary. They are unexampled, as I understand, and without any parallel in the history of jurisprudence; and I do not think that it is any disrespect to the judge to so describe them. It would not be quite proper, it seems to me, to ask the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire into an ordinary decision by a judge. The decision must be extraordinary or something unusual in order to elicit attention from the committee.

Mr. FERRY. I know but little regarding those decisions which have been made by the district judge in Virginia, and for that very reason I am unwilling to vote for a resolution containing language which every person will understand to cast some reflection upon the character of those decisions. The resolution is an instruction to the Committee on the Judiciary to make an inquiry as to the necessity of legislation growing out of certain decisions of one of the Federal courts. Now, the ordinary decisions of the Federal courts frequently require legislation, and it might in the case of the most correct judicial decisions be necessary to enact laws the necessity of which, previous to such decisions, had not been understood. But this resolution in its present phraseology does cast a reflection upon the decisions of one of the Federal courts. I do not know whether those decisions deserve that reflection or not; and because I do not know whether they deserve it or not I am unwilling to vote that such a reflection shall be incorporated in a common resolution of inquiry.

Mr. HOWARD. I ask for the reading of the resolution.

The Chief Clerk again read the resolution.

Mr. HOWARD. I would inquire what there is "extraordinary" in the decisions of the honorable judge referred to in that resolution? I really do not know; I am ignorant of it; and before I can vote for such a resolution as that I should be very glad to be informed what has been the nature of the decisions of which the resolution impliedly complains. What is the difficulty about them? In what sense are they extraordinary?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not very particular about the phraseology, as I said before. I will state to the Senate the decisions that are made by the United States district judge of Virginia, as I understand them. He holds that all judicial proceedings for the correction of persons accused of crime before the courts of Virginia are void, for the reason that the judges are not qualified to hold office according to the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution; that because a judge is not, as he holds, de jure a judge, his proceedings as a de facto judge are null and void in criminal cases. Where persons have been tried in the usual manner before a court and jury and convicted, and sentenced to imprisonment or to be hung, he holds upon habeas corpus sued out by such persons that they ought to be discharged, and that he ought to treat all the proceedings before those courts as utterly void, and in effect open the prison doors of Virginia and discharge all persons confined for the punishment of crime. That is the purport of the decisions.

Mr. HOWARD. The statement of the honorable member from Oregon presents a very grave question, one which relates to the validity of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution; as I apprehend, a question upon which certainly gentlemen may very naturally differ. I would therefore suggest to the honorable Senator that he strike out of his resolution the words which seem to convey a reflection upon Judge Underwood, for I believe that is his name, and simply frame it so as to require the committee to make an inquiry into the facts and the law of the case.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am willing to accede to the request of the honorable Senator; but I do not acquiesce in the statement that the word "extraordinary" does cast any reflection upon the United States district judge of Virginia, or that the validity of the fourteenth amendment is involved. I supposed it was necessary to express some reason why the Committee on the Judiciary should be required to review the decisions of a United States district judge, for there would be little propriety in such a resolution if the decisions were of an ordinary character and description. But as it seems to be the desire of Senators that the word "extraordinary" should be removed from the resolution, I consent to its amendment in that respect.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be so modified if there be no objection. No objection being made, the word "extraordinary" will be stricken out. The question is upon the resolution as modified.

The resolution was agreed to.

PAY OF SOUTHERN SENATORS.

Mr. MORTON. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved. That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to pay to Senators from the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Florida, Alabama, Arkansas, and Louisiana the compensation allowed by law, to be computed from the commencement of the Fortieth Congress.

I simply desire to say that this resolution is in the language of the report originally made by the Committee on the Judiciary; and I understand further that it is in consonance with the practice of the Senate for many years. I would add that if it is in consonance with the practice of the Senate there are peculiar reasons why it should be applied in these cases. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. FERRY. I object to its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The consideration of the resolution being objected to, it must go over under the rule.

Mr. FERRY subsequently said: I move to take up the resolution offered by the Senator from Indiana, to the consideration of which I objected this morning, regarding the pay of the Senators from the southern States, for the purpose of moving its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary. I have consulted the Senator from Indiana, and he assents to the reference.

No objection being made, the resolution was taken up, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. RAMSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 188) explanatory of the act to create an additional land office in the State of Minnesota, approved July, 1868; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. RAMSEY. I should be glad to have the Senate proceed to the immediate consideration of that joint resolution. It simply removes an ambiguity in a bill we passed at the close of the last session, and it is very important that it should be passed. The chairman of the Committee on Public Lands has examined it, and is satisfied.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think it had better go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over under the rule.

Mr. OSBORN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 694) to relieve sundry citizens of Florida from disabilities; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. COLE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 695) to provide a temporary government for the territory of Alaska; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ROSS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 696) to establish certain post routes in Kansas; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

Mr. MORGAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the joint resolution and papers authorizing the sale at public auction of certain surplus books and documents now in the custody of the Secretary of the Interior be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the joint Committee on the Library.

He also submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the petition and papers for the preservation of the harbors of the United States against encroachments be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the petition and papers in reference to certain accounts on the books of the Treasury Department against John A. Dix, Richard M. Blatchford, and George Opdyke be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Finance.

HARBOR OF MIDWAY ISLANDS.

Mr. CONNESS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be directed to inquire into the practicability, expediency, and probable cost of deepening the entrance to the harbor of Midway Islands, in the Pacific ocean, so as to afford a safe rendezvous and port of refuge and resort for the naval and merchant vessels of the United States.

RELIEF OF DESTITUTE.

Mr. VICKERS. I am instructed by the Committee on the District of Columbia to report a bill for the temporary relief of the poor and destitute of the District. The necessity for some relief is so pressing that I ask the Senate, on behalf of the committee, to consider the bill at the present time.

By unanimous consent the bill (S. No. 693) for the temporary relief of the poor and destitute people in the District of Columbia was read three times and passed. It proposes to appropriate $20,000 for the purpose indicated, to be expended under the supervision and direction of the mayor of the city of Washington, the mayor of the city of Georgetown, and the president of the levy court of the District of Columbia.

PROOF OF WILLS.

Mr. HARLAN. I am instructed by the Committee on the District of Columbia to report back the bill (S. No. 612) relating to the proof of wills in the District of Columbia, and to ask for its present consideration. It is a small matter, and will occupy but little time; but still it is of considerable importance.

By unanimous consent the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that whenever a will or codicil shall be exhibited for probate to the orphans' court of the District of Columbia, if any of the witnesses to the same shall reside out of the District, or be temporarily absent therefrom at the time when the will or codicil shall be so exhibited for probate, it shall and may be lawful for the court to issue, upon personal notice of not less than twenty days, to all parties in interest, a commission to one or more competent persons, to take the deposition of such absent witness or witnesses, in such form as the court may prescribe, touching the execution of such will or codicil, and the competency of the testator or testatrix, at the time of its execution; and such deposition, when returned to the court, is to be received therein as competent evidence, and have the same force and effect as if the witness or witnesses were personally present and testifying in the court. In all such cases the original will or codicil is to accompany the commission, and be exhibited to the witnesses so testifying.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to ask the Senator who reported this bill how it changes the present law?

Mr. HARLAN. I will state that this bill was introduced by the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] and I will ask him to explain the necessity of it, if he will be kind enough to do so.

Mr. CONKLING. I did introduce this bill, a long time ago, upon circumstances applicable to one case particularly, which have now faded somewhat from my recollection; but, in general terms, this is the state of facts which led to the introduction of the bill. As the law now stands, if a person dies in this District leaving a will, and one of the witnesses be at a long distance or sick, so as to be unable to attend personally in court, there is no way of making proof of the will or acting under it. It has happened several times, as it did in the case to which I refer, that a death took place, with a considerable estate left, and the subscribing witness was in a foreign land, to remain for a long time, and thus all proceedings were held in abeyance, awaiting the return, which possibly might never take place, of the witness. In the event of his not returning the testimony would be lost forever. In the event of his coming back at a future time delay would ensue. With that view, the proposition is to enable a commission to issue or testimony to be taken de bene esse in the case of a sick or absent person, so that the formal proof may be made.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My inquiry was based upon the idea that possibly the laws of Maryland, which, I suppose, are in force in this District on such subjects, directed the issuing of commissions by a court having general jurisdiction, as a probate court generally has over such a matter without any legislation. Certainly I have not any objection to this bill, except that I think it is a little too stringent in the case of a witness who is permanently absent, rather than too liberal; and if the law of Maryland is understood now to be in such a condition as not to permit a probate court to issue a commission, certainly there is no objection to this bill in that respect.

Mr. CONKLING. I did not before hear the Senator as to his inquiry. I hear him now, and I have only to say that, without having had occasion myself to examine the question at the time this bill was introduced, I was told by counsel who had examined it that there was no provision under which the orphans' court, the place into which wills are carried here, could supply itself with testimony except by the personal presence of the subscribing witnesses.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REMOVAL OF POLITICAL DISABILITIES.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 184) for the removal of political disabilities, and also the bill (S. No. 656) to remove political disabilities, to report them back adversely.

I am also instructed by the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 670) to relieve sundry citizens of South Carolina from disabilities; to report it back favorably, with an amendment; and if there be no objection I ask for the consideration of the bill now, as there are some reasons why it should pass before the holidays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires unanimous consent to consider the bill now.

Mr. DRAKE. I ask the Senator from Illinois if he will be so kind as to allow that bill to rest until to-morrow? I have received a letter from a gentleman of great respectability in South Carolina very strongly urging the removal of political disabilities from a citizen of that State. I have not the papers with me now, and I do not know whether the name is embraced in this bill or not; but I ask that it lie over until to-morrow, by which time I can obtain those papers.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have no sort of objection; but the Senator from South Carolina, who is interested in the matter, gave as a reason that a number of the gentlemen included in this bill have been elected to offices in South Carolina, and it is necessary that they should qualify by the 1st of January, and a postponement of the bill might delay it beyond the holidays. That was the only reason why I asked for the present consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. An objection carries it over. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DRAKE. Let it lie over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, it goes over.

PAY FOR GOVERNMENT LABOR.

Mr. CONNESS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 666.

Mr. CATTELL. I ask the indulgence of the Senator from California to allow me to call up the resolution of the Committee on Finance in regard to the President's message, which ought to be promptly passed. It will give rise to no discussion.

Mr. CONNESS. This bill will occupy a great deal less time, and the Senator knows that that resolution will occupy the entire morning hour. I hope he will let this bill be acted upon, and then I will join him in taking up that resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from California, to take up the bill (S. No. 666) fixing the compensation for labor performed for the Government of the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator from California expects that bill to pass without debate I am sorry to inform him that he is mistaken. I think the bill that we passed at the last session was so vicious, so injurious to the public service, that I could not allow this explanatory bill to pass without considerable debate. I am willing at any time to go into that debate; but I do not wish to crowd my friend from Indiana, [Mr. MORRIS,] who desires to go on at one o'clock with his remarks. I do not wish to interfere at all with the management of the bill, but I certainly wish to enter my protest against it.

Mr. CONNESS. I have no objection that the honorable Senator shall debate this bill, and I should like to hear him. I should like, indeed, to hear any Senator give a good reason why it should not pass. I hope we shall proceed with its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore put the question on the motion to take up the bill, and declared that the yeas appeared to have it.

Mr. CONNESS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CONNESS. I wish to say to the Senate in this connection that my purpose, of course, is not to intrude upon the Senator from Indiana. When the hour of one o'clock arrives he will be entitled to the floor; but this is a subject that cannot be properly or in good taste evaded, in my opinion.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. I ask to have the bill read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That from and after June 25, 1868, all laborers, workmen, and mechanics engaged in the employment of the Government of the United States shall receive for a day's labor, as provided by law, the full wages and compensation paid for such labor as if ten hours constituted a day's labor.

Mr. SHERMAN. The only objection I have to taking up this bill now is that it will give it a priority over other business in the morning hour at this period of the session that would be very injurious. The Senator can, no doubt, call up this bill at any day; I shall not interpose objection; but it will lead to some debate, and at one o'clock, by common consent, the Senator from Indiana is to proceed with his remarks. I think the Senator will not make anything by taking up the bill now; and it is a vicious precedent to take up bills of general legislation which will excite debate in the morning hour.

Mr. CONNESS. If this bill is not to be taken up in the morning hour I should like to know when the honorable Senator from Ohio would consent to have it taken up? When we meet here after the holidays that Senator will demand the attention of the Senate for bills reported from his committee. This bill is not a very important one, perhaps, to the holders of the bonds of the United States, nor to the men interested in the great financial questions of this country; but it is deeply interesting to men a portion of whose wages have been withheld during the past fall and this winter thus far, and withheld most unjustly by those employed in paying the debts of the Government, construing laws against the plain intent of the body that passed them. I hope, sir, that we shall go on with its consideration.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 22, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Buckalew, Conness, Dixon, Harris, Hendricks, McCreery, Patterson of Tennessee, Pool, Ramsey, Rice, Robertson, Stewart, Thayer, Tipton, Vickers, Wade, Warner, Welch, Whyte, Williams, and Wilson—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Conkling, Corbett, Davis, Drake, Edmunds, Ferry, Fessenden, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Howard, Howe, Kellogg, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Norton, Osborn, Pomeroy, Ross, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Willey—28.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Cameron, Cattell, Cole, Cragin, Doolittle, Harlan, Henderson, McDonald, Morton, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Sawyer, Spencer, Sprague, and Yates—16.

So the motion was not agreed to.

COST OF FRACTIONAL CURRENCY.

Mr. CORBETT. I offer the following resolution; and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to furnish the Senate, as near as practicable, for the information of the Senate, the total cost to the Government of the issue of the paper fractional currency since its authorization.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will state to the honorable Senator from Oregon that that subject is under investigation at this time. Testimony is being taken and examination is being made about it, and I hope to be able to make a report on the subject not very long after the holidays. I have no objection to the resolution other than the extra expense and trouble it will put the Department to beyond the investigation we are making.

Mr. CORBETT. I will ask the Senator if the expense of the fractional currency is being separated from that of the national currency in that investigation?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; it is not. There is no way, so far as I know anything about the accounts in that respect, of separating that expense from the expense of the other printing in the Printing Bureau of the Treasury, because the paper upon which it is printed and the men and machines who do the work all run together in one account, together with the other printing that is done of bonds and notes and certificates, and all that sort of thing. Hence it will be impossible to separate it otherwise than by a reasonable estimation, taking into view the whole amount of work done upon them all, so far as I understand. I wish to say again that I have no special objection to the resolution other than the unnecessary labor it produces.

Mr. CORBETT. The design of this resolution is confined to the fractional currency alone. I noticed in looking through the Treasury Department that there was an immense quantity of work there in printing this currency and reprinting it, and I desire to ascertain as near as practicable, as stated in the resolution, the cost of this fractional currency, that we may know whether it will not be cheaper to the Government to substitute a silver currency or coin for that fractional currency, and thus avoid that expense; and for that reason I desire the resolution adopted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not make any objection, if the Senator insists upon it after the explanation I have made.

The resolution was adopted.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL OF BILLS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. WILLIAM G. MOORE, his Secretary, announced that the President had approved and signed, on the 15th instant, the following bills and joint resolution:

A bill (S. No. 186) providing for the sale of the lands, tenements, and water privileges belonging to the United States at and near Harper's Ferry, in the county of Jefferson, West Virginia;

A bill (S. No. 565) to authorize the Secretary of State to adjust the claim of Gustavus G. Cushman for office rent while commissioner under the reciprocity treaty; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 170) in relation to the library of the Department of Agriculture.

RAILROADS IN THE STATES.

Mr. SHERMAN. I gave notice in reporting the bill in regard to railroads that I should call it up to-day; but to give the Senator from Indiana an opportunity to express his views on another bill, and on consulting the gentlemen who are opposed to the bill, I move that it be taken up with a view to its postponement to the 5th of January. I was instructed by the select committee to urge it constantly upon the attention of the Senate, and I give notice that at the meeting of the Senate after the holidays I shall move to take it up. I move now that it be taken up and postponed until the 5th of January.

Mr. GRIMES. It will be postponed anyhow without a motion.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator does not gain anything by such a motion unless he proposes to make it a special order.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not want to make it a special order. It was postponed until to-day, and I wish to keep it in that position.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves that the bill be taken up for consideration for the purpose of postponing it to another day. Is there any objection?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Is the effect of that the same as making it a special order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not at all.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not ask that it be made a special order.

Mr. POMEROY. I ask the Senator from Ohio what is the effect of his motion?

Mr. SHERMAN. It does not make the bill a special order; but it will come up at one o'clock on Tuesday, the 5th of January, unless some other special business intervenes.

Mr. POMEROY. No; the unfinished business of the preceding adjournment would be first in order on that day.

Mr. SHERMAN. I made this motion merely for the purpose of giving notice that the bill will then come up. I made it after consulting gentlemen opposed to the bill, who agree that after that time they will make no objection to its being taken up, considered, and acted on.

Mr. POMEROY. This has simply the effect of notifying the Senate that the Senator will call up the bill on the day named. It gives it no precedence.

Mr. SHERMAN. This is an ordinary motion. The bill being now pending, I move to postpone its consideration to the first Tuesday in January.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first question is on the motion to take up the bill (S. No. 554) to promote commerce among the States and to cheapen the transportation of the mails and military and naval stores.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio, to postpone the further consideration of the bill until the 5th day of January next.

The motion was agreed to.

COIN PAYMENT OF PUBLIC DEBT.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Committee on Finance having this morning in my absence reported back the resolution that I had the honor to introduce last year touching the public debt, and having also reported another resolution which was intended to take its place, as I understand, I wish to give notice that I shall ask the Senate to-morrow to proceed to its consideration; and for that purpose I should be glad to have the Senate take it up this afternoon, in order that we may enter upon its consideration, so that it may be in order to-morrow. I say this now, when the Senate is full, that everybody may understand it.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 1587) to repeal certain provisions of section six of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1867;

A bill (H. R. No. 1555) to amend an act entitled "An act imposing taxes on distilled spirits and tobacco, and for other purposes," approved July 20, 1868; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1556) to relieve certain persons of all political disabilities imposed by the fourteenth article of the Constitution of the United States.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the unfinished business of yesterday is now regularly before the Senate, being the bill (S. No. 625) for the relief of Miss Sue Murphey, of Decatur, Alabama.

Mr. MORTON. I move that the unfinished business be postponed for the purpose of taking up Senate bill No. 678.

Mr. HOWE. I hope the Senator from Indiana will not make that motion. If he desires to address the Senate to-day, as it is said by Senators about me that he does, upon any particular measure, I have no objection to this bill being laid aside informally so that the measure to which he refers may come up.

Mr. MORTON. I consent to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to passing by the unfinished business informally? ["None."] The unfinished business will accordingly be laid aside.

RESUMPTION OF SPECIE PAYMENTS.

Mr. MORTON. I move now to take from the table the bill (S. No. 678) to provide for the redemption in coin of the United States notes and fractional currency, and requiring the national banks to redeem their notes in coin, on which I desire to address the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, among the mighty changes wrought by the war is the revolution in the character of our currency. The war found us with gold and silver a part of the circulating medium, and with a convertible paper currency, the issues of local banks created by authority of the several States. When it ended, gold and silver and this bank paper had been banished from the circulation, and in their places substituted the notes of the Government and of the national banks.

The great problem now to be solved is to reintroduce into the currency gold and silver, which can be done only by making the notes of the Government and of the national banks convertible into coin at par. These notes are now greatly depreciated, and since the 1st of July gold has fluctuated between thirty-two and a half and forty-nine cents premium. These fluctuations in the value of the currency affect every kind of business disastrously. The prices of provisions, goods, and labor change from month to month. Every branch of legitimate business which depends upon small but regular profits is greatly impaired. With such fluctuations in the value of the currency, in the cost of living, in the profits of business, and the value of everything that enters into trade, together with the painful uncertainty that hangs over the whole financial policy of the country, men hesitate to engage in new enterprises or to make new investments in business. The prudent capitalist is standing still, awaiting the course of events and the establishment of some definite financial policy by which he can judge of the future. It is impossible to calculate the aggregate loss to the country, even in one year, by this state of things, or to estimate the suffering and destitution produced by stagnation of business and the want of employment for labor; and it is not only the business but the imperative duty of Congress to address itself to the great work of reform by adopting such legislation, if possible, whereby the currency shall be made good and business be made to flow on prosperously through its regular channels. The business transactions of the country, amounting to many thousand million dollars in the course of the year, are conducted through the medium of the currency, and if the currency is depreciated, fluctuating, and deceptive, the prosperity of the country must inevitably be seriously injured and its general progress and development delayed.

The question to which I invite the attention of the Senate to-day is whether such legislation may be had, and a plan adopted whereby the currency can be made good and the Government return to specie payments without producing a crash or great commercial distress.

And first, I will consider some of the difficulties which, it is urged, will prevent a return to specie payments.

It is said by many that the currency is redundant, and that we cannot return to specie payments until contraction has taken place. We are referred to the fact that before the war, in 1860, the entire bank circulation was but $202,000,000, and the specie in the vaults of the banks about eighty-eight million dollars, making less than three hundred million dollars. But at that time gold and silver were in circulation as a part of the currency, and it is probable that there was more than one hundred and fifty million dollars in the country beside that which was held in the banks. This would bring up the mixed currency to nearly four hundred and fifty million dollars. The Director of the Mint in Philadelphia in 1861 estimated the amount of gold and silver in the country at $275,000,000, which is nearly fifty millions beyond my estimate. But there was another form of currency then much more in use than now, which must not be overlooked in considering the aggregate currency of the country. The paper money consisted of the issues of local banks, and was not current except in the locality of the banks by which it was issued. Then the paper money of the northwestern, southern, and southwestern States was not current in

New York, and was not received there in payment of debts. The bank notes of the northern States were not current in the southern States, and vice versa. Hence the payment of debts and commercial transactions between different parts of the country were conducted by bills of exchange, which amounted to many hundred million dollars during the year. This form of currency is still used, but not nearly to the same extent as before the war. Now the greenbacks and national bank notes are of equal value in every part of the United States, and are transmitted in payment of debts and transactions of business from one part of the country to another, by means of express companies and otherwise, to the amount of many hundred millions every year. The books of the express companies show an immense transportation of paper money, the amount of which cannot be accurately ascertained. But it would be a moderate computation to say that $100,000,000 of our currency are now used in that way, which was before the war supplied by bills of exchange and promissory notes. And when we consider the progress of the country since 1860, the rapid development and opening up of the western States and Territories, the vast extension of business, the magnitude of the national debt, the necessary collection of large revenues, and the greatly increased expenses of the Government in its general administration, we may reasonably conclude that there is an actual demand for an increase of the currency over the wants of 1860 to the amount of at least $150,000,000. Therefore, when you add to the actual currency of 1860—about four hundred and fifty million dollars—the amount of currency now used in the place of former bills of exchange and promissory notes, and the increased demand for currency otherwise growing out of the causes referred to, it is doubtful whether the currency is more redundant now than it was in 1860, when the banks were paying specie. And if not redundant, then contraction is not a necessary preliminary measure to a return to specie payments.

Again, it is said that the Government cannot return to specie payments until after we have checked the flow of our gold to Europe by largely reducing our importations of foreign goods. This is a clear case of putting the disease for the remedy. Gold, like every other commodity, is governed by the great commercial law of demand and supply. It goes where it is needed, and leaves the country where it is not in demand. In this country there is now but one demand for gold, which is to pay duties on imports. The great use to which it is ordinarily applied, to constitute a currency and medium of exchange, has been cut off for five years, and our gold has steadily flowed into other countries where it is demanded for a currency.

In whatever country paper money has been made a legal tender, it has invariably driven gold and silver from the circulation, and in great part from the country. Thus it is that Canada is now flooded with American silver. Thus it is that American gold has gone to Europe in a steady stream for five years. Thus it was during the French revolution, when the assignats, a legal-tender currency like our own, drove French gold into all of the neighboring countries, so that when the assignats finally collapsed, as they did in a single day, France found herself almost destitute of coin. And thus it was during the long suspension of the Bank of England, when English gold went steadily out, and was only recalled by the preparations made to return to specie payments.

We cannot retain our gold at home except by making a demand for it. The holders of it are not patriotic enough to keep it here for nothing. If we would reduce the importation of foreign goods we must withhold the gold with which they are purchased. And this we cannot do except by making it more profitable to keep it at home than to send it abroad. Until we create this home demand the annual product of our mines in chief part will go to England, France, and Germany to swell the rich volume of their currency.

Again, it is said that specie payments cannot be brought about by special legislation, or materially aided thereby, but can be produced only by the operation of general causes, such as the increase of the tariff, the increase of population and development of the resources of the country, whereby the general credit of the Government will be improved. To understand the merits of this proposition we must consider what are the causes of the depreciation of the currency, and this I will do in answering another proposition which is said to present the best and readiest method of returning to specie payments. It is alleged that we can only raise the value of our currency by raising the value of our bonds in the market; that as we bring up the price of our bonds we shall thereby bring up the value of greenbacks; that we can only improve the value of the currency by improving the general credit of the Government, as shown by the value of our stocks, and to this end the surplus gold in the Treasury and that which is to accrue should be applied to the purchase of our bonds in the market, to be canceled, thus diminishing the number of them and improving the value of the balance.

This view of the question I hold to be a total misconception. I do not believe that the existence of our bonded debt has anything, or scarcely anything, to do with the depreciation of our currency. I believe our currency would be depreciated as it is if the Government did not owe a single bond or if all our bonds were at par. Why is our currency depreciated? And why would it be depreciated if the Government did not owe a single bond? Because the greenback note is a promise by the Government to pay so many dollars on demand, which it does not pay. The promise is daily broken, and has long been dishonored. The note draws no interest, and the Government has fixed no time when it will pay it. Under such circumstances the note must be depreciated. The solvency or ultimate ability of the promisor never kept overdue paper at par, and never will. To do that something more is required than the ultimate wealth or ability of the promisor. There must be certainty in the payment and time of payment, and if the time of payment be deferred compensation must be made by the payment of interest. Let me suppose, by way of argument, that A. T. Stewart, the great merchant in New York, should pay off his numerous employes in due bills or notes payable on demand, which draw no interest, and which he refuses to pay on demand and will fix no time when he will. Notwithstanding his immense wealth and his entire ability to pay, his notes would inevitably depreciate, and could only be sold at a large discount, which would be increased if it were admitted that there was no legal remedy by which he could be compelled to pay them. One of the wealthiest men in the Northwest, now dead, who left some five million dollars to be divided among his heirs, had an unfortunate habit of refusing to pay his small debts. Instead of paying he would give his notes for them, refuse to pay the notes at maturity, suffer himself to be sued, then hire a lawyer to fight the cases. The result was that his paper was hawked about the streets at sixty or seventy cents on the dollar, while, perhaps, that of his near neighbor, who kept a small store and was only worth $10,000, but who was prompt in the payment of his debts, could be sold at a very small discount.

In overcoming the depreciation of the currency we have to overcome the difference in value between the greenback currency and the like amount of gold, and not the difference between two thousand millions of bonded debt and two thousand millions in gold. Even if the credit of the Government was so greatly impaired as that her bonds were not worth twenty-five cents on the dollar, still it would not be impossible to make the currency good and keep it at par. If the Government did not owe a single bond the value of our currency could not be improved, except by making arrangements to redeem it; and if the Government does make arrangements to redeem it the existence of the bonded debt will not prevent the improvement in its value. If we should take the surplus gold in the Treasury and that which is to accrue and use it in the purchase of bonds in the market, to be canceled as purchased, we should inevitably further depreciate the value of the greenbacks. The explanation of this effect is simple. By taking the gold, which is the only means by which the greenbacks can be redeemed, and applying it to the purchase of bonds, it puts the redemption of the greenbacks out of the power of the Government, and proclaims to the world that it does not intend to return to specie payments.

The proposal to improve our currency by taking our surplus gold and investing it in bonds would be regarded by capitalists as absurd. The gold thus paid out would not enter into the circulation, but would sink back into an article of merchandise to be gambled for, as it now is in Wall street. What would the world think of the morality of such an operation? We have $356,000,000 of the public debt overdue and drawing no interest, and we take the only means of paying this debt and apply it to the purchase, at a discount, of our bonds, which will not be due under fourteen years. What would be said of the integrity of the man who should refuse to pay his debts which are due, leaving his creditors to suffer great loss, and should employ his money to buy up at a heavy shave his debts that will not be due under ten or fifteen years? Plain people would call such a man rascal and swindler, and would speak of the Government in the same terms under the same circumstances. The pretense that it was done to improve the value of the currency would deceive nobody. Such a plan of returning to specie payments is worthy of the circumlocution office, and should be labeled "How not to do it."

The greenback currency is a part of the public debt, for the redemption of which the faith of the nation is solemnly pledged. The redemption of this pledge is not only demanded by every principle of national honor, but is imperatively demanded by the interests of the people, collectively and individually. The currency of a country lies at the foundation of its daily business and vitally affects the interest of every class and condition of people, and if the Government, overlooking its honor and its duty, should take the only means by which it can be improved and apply it to the purchase of bonds which will not be due for many years it would merit and receive the indignation and contempt of honest men everywhere.

But it is said that if the Government reserves and holds the surplus gold in the Treasury, to be applied to the redemption of the greenback currency at some future time, to be fixed by law, it will suffer great loss in the interest on the gold thus held in reserve. In one point of view this objection is well taken. But what else can we do? Is it not a difficulty to be encountered by every debtor who collects and holds the money wherewith to finally pay his debts? If a man owe $1,000 can he pay it in any other way than by collecting the money for that purpose and holding it until he gets enough to meet his debt? The Government owes a debt which can only be paid in gold, and it must, if it intends to pay it, collect the necessary amount in gold. If the debt was of that nature that the gold could be paid out on it as soon as collected, of course it should be done; but the debt is not of that nature. If the Government should pay out the gold as fast as it is received in the redemption of the greenback currency it would fail to bring the remainder of the currency up to par, and the gold thus paid out would not enter into the circulation, but would sink back into an article of merchandise such as it now is. The redemption of the greenback currency should not begin until the Government is prepared to redeem all that may be presented; for this would at once bring the whole body of the currency to par, and the gold paid out would go into the circulation and take the place of the paper money redeemed. But if paid out by piecemeal in advance it would not go into circulation or bring up the balance of the currency to par. But what will be the actual loss of the interest on the gold held in reserve compared with the loss sustained by the great mass of the people in their labor, trade, and property, to be suffered by the continuance of the present condition of the currency? Scarcely as one dollar is to a hundred. The losses by the failure to employ labor; by the stagnation of business; by the paralysis of trade; by the delay in general progress and development, brought about by depreciated, fluctuating, and deceptive currency, when estimated in dollars, would form a vast sum, compared with which the loss of interest on the reserved gold would be a mere bagatelle.

But if we do not obtain the gold to redeem the greenback currency in the manner proposed, in what other way or at what time shall it be obtained? Shall the Government go into Wall street and buy it like the importers or the gamblers? Or shall we sell new bonds in Europe at seventy or seventy-two cents on the dollar and obtain it in that way? Will it be easier to begin the process at the end of five years, the nation suffering in the mean time all the evils and losses of depreciation? Shall the nation stand shivering for years on the banks of this Jordan and then make the plunge when the waters are deeper, swifter, and colder than now? Such is not the part of wisdom or patriotic statesmanship.

If an individual fails to pay his debts payment may be enforced by the law against his property, but against the Government there is no such remedy. What would be mere neglect or failure, therefore, on the part of an individual would be repudiation by a Government.

If the greenback note is to be regarded as an obligation for the payment of which the faith of the Government is pledged the continued failure of the Government to make any provision for its redemption cannot be regarded in any other light than repudiation. When the first of these notes were issued it was provided that they might be funded into the five-twenty bonds, but that provision was shortly after repealed, and they now stand in the nature of a forced loan, drawing no interest, and, for all that appears, are to be left to perish in the hands of the people.

If when the five-twenty bonds fall due the Government should fail to pay them, or to make any satisfactory provision for funding them into a new bond, the cry of repudiation would at once be raised; and yet it cannot be shown that the legal and moral obligation to pay those bonds at maturity is greater than that resting on the Government to make prompt provision for the redemption of the greenback currency. The legal obligation is no greater, and the moral obligation hardly so strong; for the greenback notes are in fact the people's bonds, the bonds of the million, in which are invested the laborer's toil and the meager profits of the humble occupations in life, which, more than any others, demand the fostering and protecting care of the Government.

But while it is true that the discount on our bonds has little, if anything, to do with the depreciation of our currency, it is also true that the depreciation of the currency has much to do with the discount on the bonds. I do not believe that our bonds will ever reach par, or approach it nearly, until the currency is made good.

The legal-tender currency of a country bears an intimate and, perhaps, a mysterious relation to every form of credit and security, both public and private, and if it be depreciated inevitably drags them down to its own level. This I state as a general proposition, to which there may be a few exceptions, dependent upon grounds which can be readily explained. The legal-tender currency is at par in contemplation of law and in the payment of debts, though it may not be worth six cents on the dollar. It is the "par" and measure of price and value recognized in all the ordinary business of the country. The prices of property and all articles of trade are not given at so much in gold, but in greenbacks, and the legal-tender value of the greenbacks is so identified in the public mind with the measurement in price of every species of property, merchandise, and labor, that it assimilates to itself as well the price of securities, even though by their terms they may be made expressly payable in gold.

We find a full illustration of the operation of this principle in the history of the five-twenty and ten-forty bonds. These bonds were sold at par by the Government for greenbacks when the greenbacks ranged in value, at different times, from ninety to thirty-four cents on the dollar. Whatever might be the value of the greenback dollar, the bonds were still sold at par for that dollar, and such is their measure of value to-day in the markets of the world. The five-twenty bond is sold at 110, 111, 112, and 113 in greenbacks in the New York market. The premium grows out of the semi-annual payment of a large interest, and it is hardly so large as the premium which was paid on United States six per cent. stocks before the war in gold. So that, in point of fact, the par value of these bonds in New York is measured by the legal "par" of the greenback currency.

The value of the ten-forty bonds in the market, although by their express terms payable in gold, is governed by the same legal "par," and what is true of the market value of these bonds in the United States is equally true of their market value in Europe. Here their price is calculated in greenbacks, and there in gold. There the price has ranged from sixty to seventy-two cents on the dollar in gold, and is always kept within the gold value of the greenback currency in New York, perhaps with the addition of two or three cents, growing out of the premium paid for them at home on account of their large interest. They have not been able to escape from the thrall of the greenback currency, either at home or abroad, and never will while it remains in circulation. As the value of our legal-tender currency goes up the price of our bonds will go up with it; and what is true of Government securities is equally true of the great mass of American securities, public and private. State stocks that were at par in gold before the war are now about par in greenbacks, although they are certainly as good now as they were then. Their gold value has fallen off from twenty-five to thirty per cent. To this statement there are two exceptions: the stocks of Massachusetts and California, which have maintained their former price in gold because the interest has always been paid in gold, and few if any of them are on the market. Railroad bonds—which, as a general thing, are worth more now than before the war, because the floating debts of the companies have been paid off and their business generally improved—that were about par in gold before the war now command about the same price in greenbacks, showing that their gold value has been reduced from twenty-five to thirty per cent. Of course, the relative prices of bonds are not entirely uniform, because various circumstances enter into them; but it will be found on examination that they bear about the same general price in greenbacks that they did in gold before the war. Another obstacle to the adoption of any plan for returning to specie payments is the cry that the right way to resume is to resume at once. I have labored to find that this means anything but the indefinite postponement of resumption. Every one must comprehend that the Government cannot redeem the greenback currency without first collecting the gold to do it with; that it cannot return to specie payments by contraction without taking time to contract, with all its attending calamities; that, in short, there is no process by which it can be done, however ruinous, that does not involve time. If the Government should pay out the $70,000,000 surplus gold now in the Treasury in the redemption of an equal amount of greenbacks the whole country would know that it was not prepared to redeem any more. The gold paid out would not pass into circulation, but sink back into an article of merchandise, the balance of the greenback currency be but little improved, and the net result of the operation would simply be the contraction of the currency to the extent of $70,000,000 and the indefinite postponement of the redemption of the balance.

But the great obstacle to the return to specie payments, and the one which we will have the greatest difficulty in overcoming, is the interest against it. The premium upon gold, and the advantages it gives to certain classes over others, was unavoidable in the beginning, but should not be allowed to continue a single day longer than is necessary. The present condition of things produces great inequalities among the people, which if longer continued will give rise to heartburnings and tend to demoralize the public sentiment in relation to our national obligations.

To illustrate: I will suppose that A has an income of $5,000 in gold derived from interest on United States stocks. Upon this he would pay an income tax in currency, but no tax on the stocks from which it is derived. When this income is converted into currency it will net him about seven thousand dollars. On the other hand, B has an income of $5,000 in currency derived from agriculture, merchandise, or manufactures, and pays a tax of at least two per cent. on the appraised value of the different kinds of property from which this income is derived. This will reduce his income probably to $3,500, upon which he pays an income tax, leaving a balance in favor of A, as between them, of $3,500.

To illustrate again: A is the owner of $10,000 five-twenty bonds, from which he derives an income of $600 in gold. This gold, when converted, will realize $800 in currency, and upon his bonds he pays no tax whatever. B is the owner of $10,000 in six per cent. railroad bonds, from which he derives an income of $600 in currency, and upon these bonds he pays at least two per cent. for State and county purposes, which will reduce his income to $400, just one half the amount of A's. B may, perhaps, not feel very comfortable over this state of things, and will be led to inquire into the cause of this gross inequality. He will be told that so far as it arises from taxation it is unavoidable, as the States cannot tax Government securities; but so far as it arises from the condition of the currency speedy relief may be afforded by the Government if it will. Equal rights are the gift of God to all men, and equal conditions in society, equal facilities for acquiring wealth, equal rewards for labor, and the equal support of public burdens should be given by every Government to its people so far as it may be possible.

To the man who lent his money to the Government to carry on the war for the suppression of the rebellion I am grateful. Whatever may have been his motives he was a public benefactor, and entitled to the thanks of the nation. To him the Government must keep faith, whatever that faith may be; for good faith covers a nation like a clear and refreshing atmosphere, which imparts health and vigor to men and through which all nature seems beautiful and bright. But when faith is broken, it is as if the air were filled with noxious vapors, which obscure the sight, impair the health, and end in darkness, disease, and death. But while our creditors should receive all that they are entitled to in law and equity it is not bad faith to improve the condition of the balance of the people and bring them up as nearly as possible to the same prosperous level. The exemption from taxation is a legitimate advantage, as it results from the nature of their securities; but the additional profit of a premium on their gold was accidental in the beginning, and if continued for their benefit, and beyond the necessity which created it, would become fraudulent to the rest of the nation.

The credit of the Government of the United States was never so good as it is now. There is more confidence to-day in the perpetuity of the Government than ever before. It has been tried as no existing Government ever has, and in the midst of the deadly struggle, when its life seemed to hang upon a thread, revealed the existence of a credit and of vast resources that astonished the world. At the beginning of the war, and before, it could not borrow a dollar in Europe, and can scarcely be said to have had any credit; and this was one of the things relied upon by the conspirators in their calculations as to the amount of resistance it could make to the rebellion. Its resources never developed so rapidly as now, were never so well understood as now, and the faith of the people in the destiny of our country is greater than ever before. While there are very few men in the country who doubt the ability of the Government to pay off the whole debt, I have never met with one who doubted its ability to redeem or pay off the legal-tender notes. In regard to the redemption of these notes it has never been a question of ability but of purpose, and to say that these notes cannot be paid until the general credit of the Government is improved by the expenditure of some hundreds of millions in the purchase of bonds that will not be due for years is to fly into the face of common sense and insult the intelligence of the people.

If, as I have before said, there is an intimate and inextricable relation existing between the legal-tender currency of a country and its public securities, by which the value of its securities can never get beyond that of the currency in which the business of the country may be said to "live, move, and have its being," then the application of the gold to come into the Treasury for the next five or ten years to the purchase of bonds could add but little, if anything, to the value of the rest of the bonds or the currency. But one thing is certain, that while nobody doubts the ability of the Government to pay the notes by making reasonable preparations, if the Government neglects or abandons the currency, under whatever pretense or disguise, and applies its surplus revenues to the purchase of bonds, with a view to improve the value of the rest of them, and thus legislate for the benefit of a class—the only class in this country doing well enough, and better than any other—the currency will sink from that hour, and the very foundations of good faith will be shaken. Such legislation would be notoriously and wickedly partial and unjust. What would be thought of a great railroad corporation that should refuse to pay its overdue floating debt, and apply its current revenues to the liquidation of its long bonds, under the pretense that it would thereby improve its ability to pay its floating debt? But such legislation would be as stupid as it would be wicked for the depressed currency would inevitably carry down the bonds in its close embrace. While our overdue paper, drawing no interest, and for which no time of payment is fixed, and no preparation made, must necessarily be depreciated as it now is, still that depreciation would be far greater but for the general faith existing among the people that the Government will speedily make arrangements for its redemption. When this faith is broken the currency will sink lower, and sink rapidly.

The Secretary of the Treasury, in his last report, after making an able argument to show the evils of a depreciated currency, begins his discussion as to the means of returning to specie payments with the following statement:

"The Secretary still adheres to the opinion so frequently expressed by him, that a reduction of the paper circulation of the country until it appreciated to the specie standard was the true solution of our financial problem. But as this policy was emphatically condemned by Congress, and it is now too late to return to it, he recommends the following measures as the next best calculated to effect the desired result."

Here the Secretary reiterates his former opinion, that by largely contracting the paper currency the rest of it would be appreciated to par. How such contraction would have this effect he has never shown, and the opinion results from a misapprehension of the causes which depreciate the paper currency. Suppose the greenback currency was contracted down to $100,000,000, could the remaining hundred millions be brought to par in any other way than by making arrangements to redeem it?

You cannot pay a debt without paying it, and every trick or device to bring the currency up to par without making preparations to redeem it according to the promise on its face will be abortive and disastrous. The currency is depreciated because it is overdue and dishonored, draws no interest, and there is no time fixed or preparation made for its redemption; and these causes would depreciate it if there were but $1,000,000 of it afloat. The effort to force depreciated and irredeemable paper up to par by making it scarce and pinching the people is like an attempt to enhance the price of unwholesome provisions by producing a famine.

The means he suggests for returning to specie payments are twofold. The first is to legalize specific contracts to be executed in coin. I voted for a bill for that purpose last session without much consideration, and have since become satisfied it was an error. The unwary would be enticed into such contracts by the crafty, and those in straightened circumstances or under heavy pressure would be forced into them. No man can safely make a contract to be executed in coin while the currency is depreciated and the financial condition of the country is fluctuating. Such contracts, where not brought about by coercion or fraud, would be in the nature of gold gambling—the one party trusting that gold would be at a large premium when the contract was due, and the other that it would command little or none. It could hardly be distinguished from a contract for the delivery of gold at a future time. Should coin contracts be legalized, however, as proposed, it should only be in connection with some general plan to return to specie payments at a fixed period. But, aside from the evils and hardships to result from such contracts, how could they appreciate the value of the currency any more than common contracts for the future delivery of gold? They would not constitute any preparation on the part of the Government for the redemption of the currency, and therefore could not, to any perceptible extent, appreciate its value.

The second means for returning to specie payments is contained in the following passage from the Secretary's report:

"And he therefore recommends, in addition to the enactment by which contracts for the payment of coin can be enforced, that it be declared that after the 1st day of January, 1870, United States notes shall cease to be a legal tender in payment of all private debts subsequently contracted, and that after the 1st day of January, 1871, they shall cease to be a legal tender on any contract for any purpose whatever, except Government dues, for which they are now receivable. The law should also authorize the conversion of these notes, at the pleasure of the holders, into bonds bearing such rate of interest as may be authorized by Congress on the debt into which the present outstanding bonds may be funded."

It is not enough, it seems, that the currency is already depreciated thirty per cent.; that the Government has violated its pledge; but it is now proposed to strike off at least one third of its market value by stripping it of its legal-tender character. Its legal-tender character, by which it is made lawful money and may be used in the payment of debts, has added at least one third to its current value. And this heavy loss the Secretary proposes to inflict upon the holders of the currency at the times mentioned. The Government could be guilty of no clearer act of repudiation. To strike off one third of their value in the hands of the people does not differ in principle from making them wholly worthless. While they are depreciated and unprovided for, the Government has no right to withdraw from them any element which goes to constitute their value.

To show that such a measure would be repudiation in fact, let us consider the character of the contract between the holder of a greenback note and the Government. It is to pay so many dollars to the bearer or holder on demand. This is the original contract between the Government and the holder. The privilege of funding the notes into the five-twenty bonds, conferred by the act of February 25, 1862, and which the Secretary proposes to re-establish, only reducing the rate of interest on the bonds, is a mere collateral privilege, and in no wise affects the right of the holder of the note to demand the performance of the original contract printed on its face. When the Government, therefore, refuses to perform the original contract, and throws the holder entirely upon his collateral privilege of funding the notes into bonds, the act forms the clearest possible definition of repudiation, and does not differ in principle from the proposition of the President to apply the payment of the interest to the extinguishment of the bonded debt. When the greenbacks have been brought to par, and the Government stands ready to redeem them, then, and not till then, can their legal-tender character be taken away without repudiation.

Suppose that Congress should pass a bill providing that when the five-twenty bonds are due the holders may fund them into a three per cent. bond; and that, if they refuse to exchange, the Government will make no provision for their payment. The Secretary would call that repudiation, and yet the case is different in no respect from what he proposes. The greenback note promises to pay so many dollars on demand. The bond promises to pay so many dollars at a particular time. The greenback note declares that it is "a legal tender for all debts, public and private, except duties on imports and interest on the public debt," which gives it one third its current value. The bond promises to pay six per cent. in gold, which is its chief element of value. The greenback note promises to pay to the bearer, and so does the bond. The title to each of them passes by mere delivery, and there is no more personality about the one than there is about the other. The moral and legal obligations of the one promise are precisely equal to those of the other, and Congress has as much right to strike out the interest on the bond as to strike out the legal-tender clause on the note. The value of the greenback note may be so depreciated as to make it the interest of the holder to fund it into a bond bearing the very lowest rate of interest or no interest at all, and Congress might by legislation so impair the value of the five-twenty bond as to make it the interest of the holder to exchange it for a bond drawing interest only at the rate of two per cent. The Secretary proposes to take from the greenback currency one third of its current value by striking from it its legal-tender character, and then authorizing the holder to fund it into a bond drawing a low rate of interest, at the same time telling him, in substance, that this is a final measure, and that if he does not fund he will get nothing.

But it is true that by stripping the currency of its legal-tender character the country will at once be brought to specie payments; that is to say, there will then be no lawful money but gold and silver which would be a legal tender in payment of debts, and every man would be required to pay coin on his contracts. But the Secretary could not afford to strike down the value of the currency in this way without suggesting some provision for it, and so, notwithstanding the fact that he had just said that the policy of contraction had been emphatically condemned by Congress and it is now too late to return to it, he says the law stripping the notes of their legal-tender character should also provide for funding them into bonds, at the pleasure of the holder, bearing such rate of interest as may be authorized by Congress on the debt into which the present outstanding bonds may be funded. It may well be imagined that the holders of the notes will then be ready to fund them into any sort of bond. But what is that but contraction, pure and simple?

The Secretary's policy travels in a circle, which invariably brings him back to contraction. He proposes nothing for redemption, and offers only that policy which he says has been emphatically condemned by Congress and as emphatically by the country. Contraction is the "San-grado policy," of bleeding the country nearly to death to cure it of a disease which demands tonics and building up. The withdrawal of even $100,000,000 of the circulation would produce great stringency in the money market, innumerable bankruptcies, and most likely result in panic and crash from which the country would not recover for years, and during which the power of the Government to fund the debt and redeem the balance of the greenback currency would be paralyzed. To contract the currency to the extent of funding all the greenbacks would be financial suicide—would precipitate a disaster to the trade, industry, and prosperity of the country for which there is no example in history. We must not return to specie payments in that way. We must descend the mountain by easy slopes and gentle curves, though it may take much longer, rather than spring from the top of the precipice to be dashed to pieces at the bottom.

But it is broadly intimated by the Secretary that the Supreme Court will decide the laws making the greenbacks a legal tender in payment of debts to be unconstitutional, and therefore void. If the deed is to be done let it be by the court, and not by Congress. But it would have to be a very clear case that would justify the court in making a decision fraught with such terrible calamities to the country. If there be doubts hanging about the question they should be cast in favor of the legislation of Congress and the preservation of the vast interests that are dependent on the maintenance of the law. The Supreme Court, having jurisdiction over questions involving vast political, commercial, and social interests, should be something more than the rigid expounder of statutes or collator of precedents, and should view such questions as statesmen as well as lawyers.

It was Lord Mansfield who plucked up by the roots the hoary abuses of the law, however deeply imbedded in ancient authorities, and who, in the construction of statutes and settlement of great questions, decided them in accordance with the progress of the times and the new conditions of society, and thus rendered himself immortal in the history of jurisprudence.

Believing, as I do, that these laws are constitutional and were imperatively necessary at the time of their passage, I should look upon a decision by which they would be suddenly destroyed with horror, and the court making it would descend in history as the author of the most appalling financial disaster that ever occurred in any country. But I have full faith in the learning, ability, and patriotism of that august tribunal, and believe it will not render its decision until the question has been viewed in all its bearings and consequences. To return to specie payments without a crash is the great desideratum, and this can only be done by making the process gradual. Time is a necessary element, and the first question to be considered is the period which should be fixed by the Government to begin the redemption of the greenback notes, and in my bill I have stated the 1st day of July, 1871. Fixing a time must be the starting point of any plan which proposes to bring about resumption without crash and disaster.

In proposing to give two years and a half to begin the work of redemption I have several objects in view:

First. By establishing the period of redemption a fixed value is given to the greenback note. Now its gold value is fluctuating and deceptive, sometimes varying as much as ten per cent. in sixty days, and scarce ever remaining the same for a week at a time. But by fixing a time for its redemption a certain value is given to it. If the note is to be paid in gold on the 1st of July, 1871, its value can be determined by the ordinary rules of discount, and will steadily improve as the time for its redemption approaches, and other preparations being properly made, it will be at par on or before the day fixed for redemption by gradual appreciation. By fixing the time of redemption one chief element in the value of all commercial paper is gained, that of certainty in the time of payment.

Second. By fixing the period of redemption the country is notified and may be prepared for the change. People will have it in view in making new contracts and arrangements in business, and debtors, fearing a decline in the prices of property, will make haste to pay their debts. During this two and a half years the great body of existing debts among the people will be paid. The debt now contracted, which will not fall due for two years and a half, is very small; and is generally for real estate. The great difficulty generally attending the improvement in the value of the currency and the resumption of specie payments, where they have been suspended, is the reduction in the nominal prices of property and labor, which operates injuriously upon the debtor class. It is generally true that as the purchasing power of the currency is increased the nominal prices of property are diminished. But this effect is sometimes counteracted by the increase in the volume of the currency. The inflation of the currency, even though it be composed of gold and silver exclusively, increases the nominal prices of property, of which we have a notable instance in the history of Spain. When resumption takes place all the gold and silver will be set free and poured into the volume of the currency, thereby inflating it to a considerable extent, because the whole amount of gold and silver is very much greater than the whole amount of greenbacks that will be presented for redemption.

But, as before stated, the period of redemption is postponed so long that the great body of the existing debt will be paid before it arrives, and the declension in the prices of property, which is likely to be small, would affect but a very limited class, and would scarcely reach the general business of the country. The time given is so long that it will become stale in the public mind, all excitement and panic will pass away, and the change come so gently on that people will almost have forgotten it when it arrives.

Third. By fixing the period of redemption so far off the Government will have time to collect the amount of gold that will be necessary.

And first I will consider the amount of gold that will probably be required, and with which it will be safe to begin redemption. It is shown by the history of banking that solvent and well-conducted banks can safely carry on operations when they have one dollar in gold in their vaults to three dollars of their circulation. It is also shown by bank history that banks which have suspended specie payments, but whose solvency and good management are not suspected, have been able to resume when they have gotten into their vaults one dollar in gold to two and a half dollars of their circulation. The credit of the Government is better than that of any bank, and it can, in my opinion, resume on a smaller proportion of gold than any suspended bank under the old system.

The greenback notes, notwithstanding their depreciation, have one great merit which did not belong to the paper of any of the old State banks, which is that they are of uniform value in every part of the United States. They are far more convenient than coin for all business purposes. They can be sent to every part of the country in payment of debts better and cheaper than the transportation of coin. The traveler from Maine to Minnesota can carry $50,000 of it about his person without inconvenience or observation, saving to him the labor and anxiety of carrying coin, or the purchase of a bill of exchange. If brought to par they would be the most desirable currency the country has ever known, and the causes which usually bring about a run on the banks for gold would not operate against them or have any effect upon their value. Under the old State bank system, to which it is hoped the country will never return, there was a far greater demand for gold than would occur under the present. The banks being local in their character, and their paper not current in distant parts of the country, led to a demand on them for gold by travelers or those who had debts to pay at distant points where their notes were not current. From these and other considerations it is doubtful whether as much as one hundred millions of greenback notes would be presented for redemption. When the greenback note is as good as gold then the people will not want gold, unless for specific purposes, for it would be an inconvenience and burden.

The whole question may be thus stated: if the Government is strong with gold to redeem all the notes that may be presented but little gold will be demanded, because it will be worth no more than greenbacks; but if the Government is weak and only able to redeem a small part of the currency the gold will be hastily drawn out to sell in the market at a profit.

It is true there are $300,000,000 of national bank notes in circulation, for the redemption of which the Government is bound, under the conditions of the national banking law, and it has been urged that when the period fixed for redemption arrives the national banks would immediately rush to the Treasury with all their greenback reserves and drain it of a large part of its gold. To avoid this difficulty, and to make the process still more gradual, and to avoid all rush upon the Treasury or the banks, I propose, by my bill, that the banks shall not be required to redeem their notes in specie until the 1st of January, 1872, and during the preceding six months shall be required to hold in their vaults the same amount of greenback reserves, in which they may, as now, redeem their notes. If, during that period, they are required to hold their greenback reserves, as now, of course they cannot rush to the Treasury with them to get gold, and at the end of the time the Government will be able to meet their demands without trouble or danger. To give the banks six months to redeem their notes in gold—and perhaps I may move to make it a year—beyond the time when the Government begins the redemption of the greenback currency, will be no hardship to the Government or the people; for national bank notes being convertible into greenbacks, they will be of equal value and at par, and persons holding the bank notes who want gold for them will only have to present them to the banks and receive greenbacks in exchange, on which they would get the gold.

And now I will consider the question how the Government shall procure the gold to commence the work of redemption.

To this I answer that the sales of gold by the Secretary of the Treasury must be stopped, and the surplus gold now in the Treasury, and that which will accrue hereafter, over and above the sums required to pay the interest on the public debt and for specific uses, shall be reserved and set apart for the redemption of the greenback notes. There is now in the Treasury a surplus of not less than $70,000,000, and the accruing surplus under the present tariff for the next two and a half years cannot be less than $100,000,000, which will together make $170,000,000.

It is very difficult to form an estimate of the amount of gold in the country. * The Director of the Mint in Philadelphia in 1861 estimated the amount of gold in the country at that time to be $275,000,000, which I have no doubt was much short of the actual amount.

The Comptroller of the Currency (Mr. Hulburd) in his report last year estimated the gold product from our mines from 30th June, 1860, to 30th June, 1867, at $411,320,000.

The imports of gold from abroad during the same period were..... 78,933,587
The products of the mines during the year ending June 30, 1868, are estimated at..... 75,000,000

Making in the aggregate..... 840,253,587
To which may be added the gold circulation in California and other gold-producing States, not included in the above calculation—estimated at..... 50,000,000

Making in all..... 890,253,587.
Deducting the amount of gold exported during the same period..... 477,740,908

Leaves a balance of..... 412,512,679

There is also another large import of gold into the country from Europe of which there is no official record, the amount of which can only be guessed at. I mean that which is brought in small sums by emigrants, who come to our country at the rate of half a million a year. I have heard various conjectures as to the amount thus brought to the country, and none have put it lower than $20,000,000 per annum for the last eight years, making the sum of..... 160,000,000

Which, added to the above, makes a total sum of..... $572,512,679

But to make allowance for mistakes and exaggerations I estimate the gold and silver coin in the country at $375,000,000.

The product of the mines, for the year ending June 30, 1869, may be safely estimated at $75,000,000, and after that at $100,000,000 per annum. When the Pacific railroad is completed, which will be next year, the facilities for getting to the mines in California, Nevada, Idaho, Colorado, Utah, and Montana, and for the transportation of heavy machinery necessary for quartz mining, will be greatly increased and must add very largely to the gold and silver product.

But, after all, the question of the amount of gold in the country is by no means so important as might at first be supposed. When the greenback notes begin to appreciate in value our bonds will inevitably advance along with them, and it will be a very easy matter for the Government then to procure enough gold abroad on its bonds, added to that which is in the Treasury, to redeem the whole greenback circulation; and to this end I have in my bill provided that the Secretary of the Treasury may, as the time for redemption approaches, negotiate bonds drawing interest for the purpose of procuring gold sufficient to complete the work of redemption.

But it has been said that if the Government reserves the surplus gold in the Treasury as proposed it would become scarce in the market and difficult for importers to obtain enough with which to pay duties. This objection might have some force were it not for other considerations. When the Government fixes the time for the redemption of the greenback notes those who have been hoarding gold will think the time to sell it has come. If they hold it until the time of redemption comes it will be worth no more than greenbacks. It would be better for them to sell when the premium is thirty-five cents than to hold it until the premium is only twenty five or ten cents; and the natural, and I may say the inevitable, effect of fixing a time for redemption will be to throw a large amount of gold into the market that has hitherto been hoarded. It will then be better to hold greenbacks which are appreciating than gold which will soon lose its premium. Beside that, reserving the gold in the Treasury creates a demand for it and brings into operation the law which I have elsewhere discussed, that the supply is governed by the demand.

The currency is not redundant, as I have before undertaken to show; and contraction should not come this side of redemption, and only by the act of redemption. The greenback notes redeemed may be canceled, and the coin paid out for them will take their place in the circulation, and the currency will become mixed, but the volume of it will not be diminished. Bringing the greenback notes to par will, in chemical language, "set free" all the gold and silver in the land and pour them into the volume of the currency, thus inflating it, but the inflation will be legitimate. Then national banking may be made free, limited and restrained by the requirement of redeeming their notes in coin. Then there will be one currency for all the people, and one man's income will be equal to another's of like amount. Then our bonds, having kept pace with the appreciation of the currency, will be at par, and their disastrous flow to Europe will be checked. Then the Government can sell a four per cent. bond in the market at par, and with the proceeds pay off the present bonds if the holders refuse to exchange them, and thus reduce the aggregate interest on the debt more than forty million dollars per annum. Then the business of the country will be upon solid foundations and its prosperity enduring. At the end of two years reconstruction will in all probability have taken place; the blessings of peace will prevail throughout the land; the prosperity of the South in great part restored, and cotton, though never more called king, will play its former part in our foreign exchanges.

After the ocean has been swept by angry tempests that have engulfed gallant fleets and strewn the shores with wrecks and the bodies of the dead comes a calm. The mountain waves sink to gentle billows; the fierce gale lulls to a prosperous breeze; the sun shines forth in splendor, and the surviving mariners with joyful hearts again spread their sails, resume their courses, and speed away to their destined haven. So with our country when peace, reconstruction, and resumption have come.

It has been swept and rent by the storms of civil war. The land was strewn with the dead, and everywhere are visible the vestiges of the conflict. But peace has come, and with it reconstruction. The bright sun of prosperity shines forth in a cloudless sky. Industry, trade, and commerce again flow in their accustomed channels with accelerated currents. The tide of emigration, rising higher and higher, sweeps across from the Old World. The wilderness of the West yields up its golden treasures and blossoms as the rose, and our country moves on gloriously to its great and final destiny.

I move the reference of the bill I have just been discussing to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 1537) to repeal certain provisions of section six of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1867, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill (H. R. No. 1555) to amend an act entitled "An act imposing taxes on distilled spirits and tobacco, and for other purposes," approved July 20, 1863, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The bill (H. R. No. 1556) to relieve certain persons of all political disabilities imposed by the fourteenth article of the Constitution of the United States was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) The bill will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary if there be no objection.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That bill relates to the removal of disabilities in South Carolina. The Judiciary Committee reported a similar bill this morning, and I think there is no occasion to refer this one.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is it the same bill?

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from South Carolina has been examining it to see if all the names are the same. I think it had better go upon the Calendar and be acted upon with the other bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will take that course if there be no objection. The Chair hears no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 1558) to amend an act entitled "An act to prescribe the mode of obtaining evidence in case of contested elections," approved February 19, 1851; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 388) explanatory of an act to create an additional land office in the State of Minnesota, approved July 25, 1868.

NATIONAL DEBT.

Mr. CATTELL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution reported by the Committee on Finance yesterday with regard to that part of the President's message which related to the finances.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will remind the Senate that the first business in order is the unfinished business of yesterday. It can be laid aside by unanimous consent, or a motion to proceed to the consideration of another subject will be in order; but the unfinished business is now regularly in order. It was laid aside temporarily on the motion of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator from New Jersey is desirous of having a vote on the resolution just referred to by him, and I desire to see that resolution passed myself. If the Senate is ready to take a vote upon that resolution I have no objection that the unfinished business shall still further be laid aside informally; but if the resolution is to lead to debate it seems to me preferable that we should close one subject at a time.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Unquestionably the proposition of the Senator from New Jersey will lead to debate. There is no doubt about that, I should think. If the Senator from Wisconsin wishes to pass his bill that is all right. I have nothing to say about that.

Mr. SHERMAN. If this resolution reported by the Committee on Finance and under the charge of the Senator from New Jersey is passed at all it ought to be passed to-day. It is a simple condemnation of a certain clause of the President's message; and if we think it of sufficient importance to make it it ought to be done to-day or not at all. I look upon it as a matter of the very highest importance that the sense of the Senate should be taken upon the proposition of the President to repudiate the whole of the national debt except an annuity for sixteen years. It seems to me we can take a vote on that proposition after a little debate, if gentlemen choose to indulge in it. I do not wish to debate it. But if we intend to act upon the resolution at all it should be done before the recess. I admit that if it were a doubtful proposition it ought not to be acted on in this way.

Mr. CATTELL. If the Senator from Wisconsin will allow me, I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Indiana to the fact that the resolution of the Finance Committee was reported in such a shape that they hope and expect to get the vote of the Senator from Indiana in favor of it. All the objectionable features which were represented by him in the debate have been removed in order to secure his vote for the passage of the resolution. I do not think it will lead to debate.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I understood it was the resolution that the Senator introduced on the subject that was to be called up.

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir; another resolution reported by the committee; the one offered by the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. WILLEY.]

Mr. HENDRICKS. I should like to have the resolution read, as it has been reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on proceeding to the consideration of the resolution mentioned by the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. HENDRICKS. And I ask that it be read first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It may be read for the information of the Senate if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate, properly cherishing and upholding the good faith and honor of the nation, do hereby utterly disapprove of and condemn the sentiments and proposition contained in so much of the late annual message of the President of the United States as reads as follows: "It may be assumed that the holders of our securities have already received upon their bonds a larger amount than their original investment, measured by a gold standard. Upon this statement of facts it would seem but just and equitable that the six per cent. interest now paid by the Government should be applied to the reduction of the principal, in semi-annual installments, which, in sixteen years and eight months, would liquidate the entire national debt. Six per cent. in gold would at present rates be equal to nine per cent. in currency, and equivalent to the payment of the debt one and a half time in a fraction less than seventeen years. This, in connection with all the other advantages derived from their investment, would afford to the public creditors a fair and liberal compensation for the use of their capital, and with this they should be satisfied. The lessons of the past admonish the lender that it is not well to be over anxious in exacting from the borrower rigid compliance with the letter of the bond."

Mr. HOWE. There seems to be a very general desire that a vote should be taken upon this proposition, and I will not stand in the way of it if there is no objection to the unfinished business being laid over informally.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business can be laid aside informally if there be no objection. The Chair hears no objection. The Senator from New Jersey moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution which has just been read.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution has been read at length. The question is on its adoption. ["Question." "Question."]

Mr. DAVIS. I move to strike out all of the resolution after the word "resolved" and to insert the following as a substitute for it:

That the equitable and true measure of the liability of the United States upon all their bonds issued during and since the termination of the late rebellion is the value in gold and silver coin of the bonds of the date of their issue respectively, and interest upon that value.

Mr. President, I have not a great deal to say in support of my proposition; but what I have to say I prefer to say on some other occasion when I can be heard. At this late hour of the day I did not expect that the proposition would be called up. I hope, therefore, that the courtesy of the Senate will continue the subject over until to-morrow, that I may occupy its attention for perhaps half an hour in support of the proposition which I have moved as a substitute for the original resolution.

Mr. SHERMAN. I reported this morning, from the Committee on Finance, a resolution on which the argument of the Senator from Kentucky will be much more germane than on this proposition, and I think, therefore, it would be no denial of courtesy to him, as the subject will be constantly before the Senate, to refuse his request on this occasion. If this resolution is to pass it ought to be passed at once and confined entirely to the subject-matter of the President's message. When the other resolution is before the Senate the Senator from Kentucky will have opportunity to debate the question of his amendment. It has no pertinency to the message of the President.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I would suggest to the Senator from Kentucky that I have already given notice that either to-night before we adjourn, or to-morrow, with a view of considering it to-morrow, I shall ask the Senate to take up the resolution reported by the Committee on Finance this morning that I introduced, expressly declaring that we owe this funded debt in coin, which will raise precisely the question that is suggested in the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky to this resolution. I suggest to him, therefore, whether it would not be more convenient to submit his proposition as an amendment to the resolution referred to rather than to this. That will come up in a day or two, certainly.

Mr. DAVIS. In urging any views that I may entertain in support of my substituted proposition it will be my purpose to say something upon the identical proposition that is set forth in the message of the President. I am not at all particular, though, about giving my views at the present time in connection with the resolution offered by the Senator from West Virginia, or whether it shall be done upon the subject of the resolution which the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Vermont refer to. I would prefer, myself, at a very early time to say what I have to say upon the subject. If the proposition referred to by the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Vermont is to come up to-morrow for speedy discussion, so that I may then have an opportunity to say what I desire to say, I have no objection to the matter taking the course which the gentlemen suggest.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think I can promise the Senator that either the resolution proposed by the committee or the one offered by myself will come up to-morrow. I shall certainly ask the courtesy of the Senate to take up mine, according to the notice I have previously given, in order that at least I may have the opportunity of expressing some brief views of my own upon it. I think it safe, therefore, to assume that the courtesy of the Senate will be extended to the consideration of that subject to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky withdraw his amendment?

Mr. DAVIS. As it seems to be the sense of the Senate that the subject shall take the course indicated by the gentlemen, I withdraw it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment being withdrawn, the question is on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, in regard to this question I occupy just this attitude: I do not agree with the sentiments expressed by the President of the United States in that part of his message which is quoted in the resolution now before this body; and, on the other hand, I do not understand it to be the province of the Senate of the United States, by resolution, to discuss and express an opinion upon the sentiments the President may be pleased to express in his message. It is a constitutional duty on the part of the President to make his views known to Congress upon every important question, and I presume it is the duty of Congress to consider those views; and any expression of sentiment that Congress may have to make upon them ought to be, I should suppose, in the form of legislation. The recommendations of the President are made with a view of influencing the action of Congress in its legislation. Now, if it is not the pleasure of Congress to concur with the recommendations made by the Chief Executive, that is expressed in its refusal to legislate according to those views. But is it possible that every opinion expressed by the Executive which is not agreeable to the majority must be met by a resolution of condemnation for fear that somewhere or other it may be understood that the Congress of the United States, by its silence, acquiesces in those views? Why, sir, the Constitution itself makes the President's message to be his own expression of opinion and advice to Congress. It in no way commits Congress to an indorsement of his views unless they be adopted in legislation.

Now, I am not willing to vote a resolution of censure; nor am I willing to be understood as indorsing the precise views that the President of the United States may express on this subject. A good deal can be said on this question of repudiation. I recollect that, against my vote, the Congress of the United States, a few years ago, with a view of increasing the Army and securing colored troops from some of the States, made a pledge in a law that there should be certain payments made, and to-day we stand boldly repudiating that obligation of law. So that if Congress undertakes to say that repudiation in all forms is offensive to it Congress states what is not correct. Congress stands now to-day as repudiating an obligation that the Senator from Kentucky has urged as based upon law. That obligation of the Government was incurred without my support; I did not think it was politic at the time; but I refer to it simply as showing that Congress is not altogether clear of the offense of repudiation.

Mr. President, as expressing my views upon this subject, I move to amend the resolution by striking out all after the word "resolved," and inserting as a substitute:

That the Senate cordially indorse the sentiment in the President's message that "our national credit should be sacredly observed," and declare that the public debt shall be paid as rapidly as practicable exactly in accordance with the terms of the contracts under which the several loans were made; and where the obligations of the Government do not expressly state upon their face, or the law under which they were issued does not provide that they shall be paid in coin, they ought in right and justice to be paid in the lawful money of the United States.

I think, Mr. President, if Congress is now called upon to make any expression of opinion at all that this is the statement which ought to be made, that the public faith is to be observed, and that it is to be observed according to the contract; that if it be the contract that the bonds shall be paid in gold, they shall be thus paid; but if that be not the contract, then under the law of 1862 they may be paid in the lawful money of the United States. While we have no right to repudiate the obligation to the bondholder, and perhaps have no desire to do so, we have no right, in my judgment, to increase the obligations of the Government to the bondholder. He is entitled to his contract. When he gets his contract he cannot say that there is repudiation.

Now, I think the proposition of the President of the United States does not rest upon the contract. I do not refer to the sentiment which I have quoted in this amendment, but to the passage of the message which is quoted in the original resolution. I think the proposition of the President is not according to the law, and therefore is not the law of the case, is not the contract. But, sir, taking the law of 1862, which authorized the issue of Treasury notes, and considering the peculiar language of that law, in my judgment the amendment which I have offered does express the law of the case and the contract between the Government and the bondholder. Why not say so then, sir? If Senators believe the contract is otherwise, that can be met by adopting the resolution of the Senator from Vermont; but that we shall simply satisfy ourselves by passing a resolution of censure upon the Executive is a thing that I do not agree to; nor yet am I willing to be understood as adopting the proposition of the President. I content myself, sir, by taking a vote on this amendment, and I should like to have the yeas and nays upon it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish the Senator from Indiana would withdraw that amendment, and let us express our opinion upon the distinct proposition in the President's message, which, he confesses himself, is not the proposition either way upon which his resolution proposes to act. The President's assertion may be true, and the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana may be true also; on the other hand, the President's proposition may be false, and at the same time the proposition of the Senator from Indiana may be as false and erroneous as that is; and I should vote in favor of both the latter positions decidedly. But the proper consideration of what our national obligation is, as it respects the manner and currency in which it is to be paid, is a totally distinct question from the one which the President has presented in his message. That proposition I shall be quite ready to discuss when it properly arises upon the resolutions which have been reported by the Committee on Finance. I agree, I may say now, however, without going into the discussion, to the assertion of the Senator from Indiana, that we are to pay according to the contract; but the great question is, as between us who are the final arbiters of what that contract is and the people who hold it, what is that contract in the light of the circumstances under which it was made, in the same light that it would be viewed by the gentleman himself if he had made a promise in similar language and only his own honor could be appealed to to interpret and enforce it? That is the question; but, as I say, I do not wish to discuss that question now; and as the Senator from Kentucky has, with great courtesy and regard to the wishes of the majority of the Senate, withdrawn a proposition which covers something of the same ground, I should hope that the Senator from Indiana would do the same thing.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I should like to have the yeas and nays on the proposition which I have submitted.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, I have never bestowed much attention and have never given any discussion myself to this question of the medium in which the public debt is payable. Heretofore it has not seemed to be a practical question, one requiring immediate action and decision by Congress or by the people; but as I am obliged to go upon the record on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana, I wish to say a word or two in justice to myself.

I was very much struck with the argument heretofore made by the colleague of the Senator from Indiana, that assuming that the fifty-two bonds were payable in lawful money of the United States it would be against good faith that the volume of that currency as issued in former years should be increased. I believe it was the argument of the Senator from Indiana to whom I refer [Mr. MORROW] that the greenbacks issued up to 1864, constituting a volume of currency of a certain magnitude, were applicable under the laws to the payment of the principal of the fifty-two bonds. It was his argument that the creditor received his securities in view of the existing state of the currency under the authority given by law to the Secretary of the Treasury to issue that sort of securities, and that it would be a violation, not of express but of implied faith on the part of the Government, by issuing additional currency to reduce the amount of compensation which the creditor would receive when the bonds came to be paid. Now, sir, at present my impression is that that argument is sound; that we can apply the currency issued under the act of 1862 and one or two subsequent acts to the payment of the principal of the bonds authorized to be issued by the same class of laws passed pari passu with it; but on the other hand it would be inequitable and unjust for the Government, by diluting the currency by subsequent issues of paper money, to depreciate the value those creditors should receive. I do not know in what exact form this amendment is proposed. I am averse to voting for an amendment without any limitation, and which declares a general doctrine upon which I have bestowed no attention. I ask for the reading of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the word "resolved," and to insert:

That the Senate cordially indorse the sentiment in the President's message, that "our national credit should be sacredly observed," and declare that the public debt should be paid as rapidly as practicable, exactly in accordance with the terms of the contracts under which the several loans were made, and where the obligations of the Government do not expressly state upon their face, or the law under which they were issued does not provide, that they shall be paid in coin, they ought, in right and in justice, to be paid in the lawful money of the United States.

Mr. DIXON. I wish to inquire whether it is in order to divide that proposition, to make two questions of it. I wish to vote for a part of it, but not the whole.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read so that the Senate may know when it is divided what they will vote upon.

The CHIEF CLERK. The first branch of the amendment is—

That the Senate cordially indorse the sentiment in the President's message, that "our national credit should be sacredly observed."

Mr. DIXON. Read one sentence more.

The CHIEF CLERK:

And declare that the public debt should be paid as rapidly as practicable, exactly in accordance with the terms of the contracts under which the several loans were made, and where the obligations of the Government do not expressly state upon their face, or the law under which they were issued does not provide, that they shall be paid in coin, they ought, in right and in justice, to be paid in the lawful money of the United States.

Mr. DIXON. I propose to divide the proposition at the close of the first sentence, as I understand it, that the debt shall be paid in accordance with the terms of the contract.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator can move to amend the amendment if he wishes to do so; but the Chair does not see exactly how the proposition can be divided.

Mr. DIXON. I propose to divide the amendment so that the question shall be taken on the first branch, as follows:

That the Senate cordially indorse the sentiment in the President's message, that "our national credit should be sacredly observed," and declare that the public debt should be paid, as rapidly as practicable, exactly in accordance with the terms of the contracts under which the several loans were made.

Mr. CONNESS. It seems to me that is all one proposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is dividing a sentence of the same proposition. The Senator can move to amend the amendment if he wishes to do so, but I do not know that we can vote by piecemeal upon it. What the Senator asks is equivalent to a motion to strike out all after the words indicated by him.

Mr. POMEROY. I take it it is in order to amend the amendment by striking out all after a certain word.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That would seem to effect the object which the Senator from Connecticut desires to accomplish by a division.

Mr. POMEROY. If the Senator from Connecticut desires it I will make that motion for him.

Mr. DIXON. I do not propose to amend the amendment at all; but under the twelfth standing rule of the Senate I suppose I have a right to ask that the proposition be divided. The twelfth rule is as follows:

"If the question in debate contains several points any Senator may have the same divided."

What I ask is, that the proposition before the Senate may be divided at the point I have indicated, and that after disposing of that we then proceed to act upon the other branch. I do not offer it as an amendment, but merely submit it as a question of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not doubt the right of a Senator to call for a division of a question where it can properly be divided and voted upon in that way; and perhaps this proposition can be divided at the point named as well as any other.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask for the reading of the next clause of the twelfth rule by the Secretary. It seems to me this is a motion to strike out and insert, and it is not divisible. I will read it, as I have it in my hand:

"But on a motion to strike out and insert it shall not be in order to move for a division of the question."

The motion here is to strike out all after the word "resolved" and to insert what the Senator from Indiana proposes. Now, I understand that according to this rule such a proposition is not divisible. I am surprised that it is so; but the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHER-MAN] tells me it is. I know the rule is not so in the other House; but according to this rule I understand a Senator cannot call for a division of this question because the motion, whatever the form may be, is to strike out all after the word "resolved," and insert the amendment of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to state that I have observed the practice of the Senate for years to conform to the rule. It is different in the House of Representatives, where they sometimes confuse the Speaker by demanding a division of an amendment. That is impossible under the rules of the Senate. A proposition is offered. A substitute for it is then offered. That substitute may be amended before the vote is taken on the original proposition, but you cannot have a division of the substitute. You must take the whole of it or else amend it by striking out a portion or by adding a portion.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator from New York gives a wrong construction to that part of the twelfth rule which he has read, as I think. A motion to strike out and insert is not divisible in this, that you cannot demand a vote first upon the proposition to strike out and afterward upon the motion to insert. That is certainly the proper construction of the rule. I have never understood it to have any other meaning, and the proposition of the Senator from Ohio is not correct. I do not care anything about this question except as one of parliamentary law. Any proposition before the Senate may be divided if it be properly susceptible of division. If distinct propositions be made, and by a proposed division a distinct proposition is submitted to the Senate, and a distinct and separate proposition remains, then it is divisible. I understand that to be the rule.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask the Senator to yield to me for one moment.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. The interpretation which the Senator puts upon this rule is the interpretation always put in the House of Representatives upon a rule not precisely identical in language with this, but which I have always supposed was equivalent to this; and so far I agree with the Senator. But, as I said before, I am told by the Senator from Ohio that the construction which has been put upon it in this body has always been that offering an amendment in the nature of a substitute, the motion being to strike out and insert, gave no right to divide. Therefore, I do not want to be taken to task by the Senator for a mistake upon the original language here, because, as I had previously said to my friend before me, in the House the interpretation is, as he suggests, upon language substantially like this; but I am told that here it has always been different.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not think it has been different here. Every reason which permits a division of an original question will permit a division of an amendment. If it is the pleasure of the Senate to adopt a part of an amendment, and an independent proposition connected with it is not agreeable to the Senate, then of course the Senate ought to have an opportunity to vote according to its pleasure upon it. That is the whole reason of it, as I understand. I have no doubt that the Senator from Connecticut is right, that the proposition is divisible.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, at all events, new to me, and the Chair will refer it to the Senate to decide whether the question is susceptible of a division or not.

Mr. DAVIS. I think the motion of the Senator from Connecticut is in order. The proposition of the Senator from Indiana is in the nature of a substitute for the original resolution. The question then resolves itself into this simply: have you a right to perfect a substitute and have a vote upon that substitute on a motion to strike out and insert? I think clearly so. It may be that the substitute might be modified so as to be acceptable to the Senate, and in that way it would be perfectly according to parliamentary rule. The opportunity to perfect a substitute before the question is taken on striking out the original proposition and inserting that substitute would seem to me one of the most plain and obvious rights of the Senate and of every Senator.

Mr. POMEROY. I think there is no question of parliamentary law here, certainly. The point which has been made, that a motion to strike out and insert is not susceptible of division, does not arise. It can be made provided the Senator from Indiana should move, as he has done, to strike out and insert. That question is indivisible, clearly; you cannot take two votes on that. That is one motion. But there can be as many divisions of a substitute as there are subjects in it. This substitute may have a dozen propositions in it, and each Senator may demand a vote on each one, because it is the perfection of a substitute. The question of striking out and inserting does not come in here.

Mr. DIXON. I think the Senator from New York entirely misunderstands the intention of the clause which he read from the twelfth rule. The rule is this:

"If the question in debate contain several points any Senator may have the same divided; but on a motion to strike out and insert it shall not be in order to move for a division of the question."

Now, as I understand the Senator, he supposes that, as the motion is to strike out and insert, the matter proposed as a substitute cannot be divided. Is that his meaning? The only meaning of the rule, according to my understanding, is, that a motion to strike out and insert shall not be divided; that is, you shall not take it as a separate motion to strike out and not insert. For instance, to apply it to this case, when the Senator from Indiana proposes this as a substitute, or to strike out and insert, you shall not ask that the first question shall be whether you will strike out the original proposition and then insert his. That is the division that cannot be made; but the rule does not say that you shall not divide the proposition which is presented for insertion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will refer the question of order, whether the proposition under the rule is divisible, to the Senate.

The question being put, it was decided in the affirmative; so that the proposition was held to be susceptible of division.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the first clause of the proposition that has been read. It will be read again.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That the Senate cordially indorse the sentiment in the President's message that "our national credit should be sacredly observed," and declare that the public debt should be paid as rapidly as practicable, exactly in accordance with the terms of the contracts under which the several loans were made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to this clause of the amendment.

Mr. WHYTE. On that question I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HENDRICKS. They were ordered, I believe.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They were ordered on the whole proposition, but not on this branch of it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to inquire of the Chair, or some gentleman learned in the rules, whether, if we adopt this amendment, we adopt it in this vote as a substitute for the original resolution?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly; it takes the place of that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In that case I shall vote against it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not understand that the vote on this divided proposition substitutes it in lieu of the proposition reported by the committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It substitutes so much of it as is adopted.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Not at all. This is a proposition to perfect the substitute, as I understand it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the way the Chair understands it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It takes the place of the other proposition.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not so understand it at all.

Mr. CONNESS. Let us get the decision of the Chair upon it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. We shall get the decision in a moment; but let us understand how we are going to vote. After we have voted upon this clause of the substitute the next question will be upon the other clause of the substitute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Suppose that one clause of the substitute should be adopted and the other clause should not be, then would not the question arise on substituting the substitute as amended for the original proposition? It terminates in the same way. Suppose it were a proposition directly to amend the substitute by striking out half of it, and you struck it out, the next question would be, shall the substitute, as amended, be adopted in place of the original proposition? Now, suppose, what is actually occurring, that we divide the substitute. You strike out half the substitute by refusing to adopt it. You have not thereby substituted the substitute for the original proposition. That requires another vote. We cannot vote to substitute a part of the substitute for the original proposition. We must first determine what the substitute is upon which we vote, and that is what we are proposing to do, as I understand.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend from Illinois is altogether mistaken. The mere statement of what the question is under parliamentary law answers him entirely. The motion of the Senator from Indiana is to amend the original resolution by striking out all after the word "resolved" and inserting another proposition. That proposition is divided into two branches. The question is taken first on the first branch, and then on the second; and the identical question on the first branch is, whether we will agree to so much of his amendment as is embraced in that branch, and it therefore strikes out the whole of the original resolution after the word "resolved" and inserts so much of the amendment. Then we immediately take the question on inserting the residue of the amendment; and if we vote "ay"—

Mr. TRUMBULL. That strikes it out again.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not at all.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If adopting the first part strikes it out I should like to know if adopting the second part does not strike it out a second time?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I assure my distinguished friend that that is not the case, because it is out already, unless he has a way of striking out that which is already out. The question, therefore, in the form in which it must be put, is, will the Senate agree to strike out all after the word "resolved" in the proposition of the committee, and insert so much, that is to say, the first branch of the proposed amendment? If we say "ay" to that it is carried. Then the question immediately recurs on the second branch of the amendment, whether that also shall be inserted in lieu of all that has been already stricken out. That is the question.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not so understand the question. The question is on agreeing to so much of the substitute. It strikes out nothing. Then the question is on agreeing to the residue of the substitute; and when you have perfected your substitute, then the question is whether you will strike out the original proposition; but now there is no proposition to strike anything out. The Senator from Connecticut has called for a division of the substitute—not upon striking out the original proposition, but dividing the matter proposed to be inserted. If the Senator from Vermont is right, if when we vote upon the first part of the proposition we strike out the original resolution, when we come to vote upon the second part of the proposition what do we strike out? He says nothing at all, for you have already stricken out the original matter. Then, what are you voting on when you come to vote on the second clause of the substitute?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Voting on the insertion of an additional part of the amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. In that way, instead of perfecting your substitute and then voting on inserting it in lieu of the original proposition, you can never perfect a substitute.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We are not undertaking to perfect the substitute. The Senator from Connecticut refuses to perfect the substitute by moving to amend. He merely says he wishes to divide the question because it embraces two propositions. He does not offer to perfect it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The argument that the Senator makes would be a good argument to show that it was not divisible; but it is no argument, it seems to me, to show how the vote should be.

Mr. SHERMAN. It seems to me we are getting into this confusion by departing from the practice of the Senate and the rule. The rule, it seems to me, is plain enough. A proposition of great importance is pending that is divisible. That is the proposition under debate. Any Senator has a right to divide it, or move to amend it, or move a substitute. When he moves to strike out the whole and insert a substitute in its place that substitute itself may be amended; but you cannot have a division. You cannot take a vote on each section or each clause of that amendment or substitute, because the substitute, after all, is only an amendment. It is only a different name for an amendment. Take an ordinary case; I have seen it done a hundred times: a bill before us is referred to a committee, and a substitute for that bill is reported back from the committee; that substitute can be amended by an amendment in the ordinary way; but you cannot take a vote on every section of that substitute, and then have another vote on the original proposition. That would create interminable delay. The rule, it seems to me, is plain enough. It declares that a proposition to strike out and insert is not divisible. What does that mean? Merely that a proposition to strike out shall not be taken at one time and to insert at another? Not at all. It means that that proposition to strike out and insert what we call a substitute shall be in the nature of an amendment subject to amendment, but that it shall not be divisible; that is, the proposition is not divisible. It may be amended, which is substantially the same thing. It seems to me that if we once establish the rule that a substitute may be offered, and then that that substitute may be divided up into as many votes as there are sections or propositions in it, it will create interminable confusion and probably delay the prosecution of the public business. The Senator from Connecticut has a perfect right, if he is not satisfied with the proposition submitted by the Senator from Indiana, to move to strike out any portion of it. That will bring us to a vote upon the part to which he objects, and if he succeeds there is a vote on the rest, and then finally a vote as between that proposition and the original. I think, therefore, we had better regard this as an indivisible proposition. By departing from the rules we create confusion and trouble.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate has already determined that the proposition is divisible.

Mr. SHERMAN. There was no regular vote. It was not thoroughly understood.

Mr. HOWE. Would a motion to reconsider that vote just taken by the Senate be in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I think it would.

Mr. HOWE. I move to reconsider that vote. It seems to me, if it is possible to prohibit by a standing rule the division of a subject, the rule first read here does prohibit the division in this case. The rule makes but one proposition of a motion to strike out and insert; but if you divide either of the propositions, either the proposition to be stricken out or the proposition to be inserted, you do divide the whole question, because you do not conclude it by one vote; it takes two or more. I move to reconsider the vote, holding the question to be divisible.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not think the Senate need reconsider anything. There is really no question in this. It has been the practice of the Senate always. The Senator from Indiana moves a substitute, to strike out and insert. That is one motion. The Senator from Connecticut moves nothing, but asks to have a division of that question; that is, a division of that substitute, not of the question to strike out and insert. That is indivisible. He asks to have a division of the substitute. He has a right to ask that. It does not require any motion. Now, the question to be put by the Presiding Officer is this: Will the Senate agree to the motion of the Senator from Indiana so far as it relates to the first clause of his amendment? If the Senate vote "aye," then that is adopted, and there is no way of getting away from that except by reconsidering it.

Mr. SHERMAN. That divides the original proposition.

Mr. POMEROY. That divides the original proposition; but if the Senate vote "no," and vote it all down, then the motion of the Senator from Indiana does not prevail, and the question recurs on the original motion.

Mr. SHERMAN. If that is the case what is the use of putting the substitute question afterwards?

Mr. POMEROY. There is no such question as that to be put. It is not before the Senate and it cannot be before the Senate, because this motion to strike out and insert is one and indivisible. But a Senator says, "let us perfect it; let us take a part of it, not the whole." The Senator from Connecticut seems to be in favor of the motion of the Senator from Indiana in part; and he has the right to vote on that part, and if the Senate agree with him, then so much of it is substituted and we cannot help it except by reconsidering it.

Mr. CONKLING. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. POMEROY. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. I understand the motion to be to strike out and insert is indivisible. Suppose the first part of the motion, upon his theory, carries; the whole original is stricken out and a certain part of the substitute is inserted. Now, the next question, according to him, the motion to strike out and insert being indivisible, would be whether the whole of it should be stricken out again and the rest of this substitute inserted. Can that be?

Mr. POMEROY. No, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. If that is not so, then I submit the motion to strike out and insert must be divisible, because the only sensible motion that can be put in the second instance would be whether, having stricken out the whole of the original, this residue of the substitute should also be inserted. That would lead directly to a division of the motion to strike out and insert.

Mr. POMEROY. I think the Senator from New York cannot but see this question clear at any rate: that if we adopt the motion of the Senator from Indiana in part, we may go on beyond that and adopt it still further, adopt the balance or reject it.

Mr. CONKLING. But how? If we adopt the balance of it what is that act of the Senate?

Mr. POMEROY. The Senate then have agreed to strike out the original and insert the amendment.

Mr. CONKLING. But they have already stricken out the whole of it on the first motion.

Mr. POMEROY. But they have enlarged what should be put in by the second.

Mr. CONKLING. Exactly; and there they divide the question of striking out and inserting; because, having stricken out the whole, that part of the motion has expended itself; and now when they come simply to insert in addition to the first insertion, that is a vote upon only half the motion to strike out and insert.

Mr. RAMSEY. Will the Senator from Kansas allow me to suggest that this matter might be settled—it is a very perplexing affair—by a motion to adjourn. [Laughter.]

Mr. POMEROY. I do not think it is very perplexing. I should like to take the vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would take the liberty of making a suggestion in reference to this rule, although I do not profess to be very expert in the rules of the Senate. It seems to me that the difficulty grows out of the mistake of the Senate in deciding that this question was at all divisible. The rule says:

"If the question in debate contain several points, any Senator may have the same divided; but on a motion to strike out and insert it shall not be in order to move for a division of the question."

This was one motion. The motion to strike out and insert is one and indivisible, according to my judgment; and when a proposition is made to divide a proposed substitute, the question in point of fact is divided because the substitute and the motion to strike out are both parts of one question. The question is an entirety: shall the original matter be stricken out and the substitute inserted? That is an entirety; that you cannot divide; but if you allow this division of the proposed substitute, then you do divide the question contrary to this rule; and it seems to me that we ought to reconsider the vote and decide that the question is not divisible.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on reconsidering the vote by which the proposition was held to be divisible.

Mr. HENDRICKS. On this question I wish to say just one word. Now the proposition is that when a substitute is submitted to the Senate, the Senate cannot divide that substitute, and that the only vote which can be taken is whether the entire substitute shall be adopted in lieu of the original proposition.

Mr. WILLIAMS. You can amend it, of course, but not divide it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. You may amend it by striking out.

Mr. SHERMAN. Or inserting.

Mr. HENDRICKS. But you cannot divide. I think the practice of the Senate has been the other way. When a bill is before the Senate, and a committee reports a substitute for it, do we not consider that substitute section by section, and vote upon the adoption of the sections separately? Of course, finally, when the bill comes to pass, we have to vote upon the entire bill; but while the Senate is considering it we certainly do—it is an every-day practice, it seems to me—vote on the sections separately when they are presented as substitutes.

Several SENATORS. Never.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on reconsidering the vote by which it was determined that this question was divisible.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is whether the pending proposition is divisible.

The question being put, it was determined in the negative.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate decide that the amendment is not divisible. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS,] upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 7, nays 44; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Hendricks, McGree, Saulsbury, Vickers, and Whyte—7.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Anthony, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Corbett, Dixon, Drake, Edmunds, Ferry, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Kellogg, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Nye, Osborn, Pool, Ramsey, Rice, Robertson, Ross, Sawyer, Sherman, Spencer, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Warner, Welch, Willey, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—44.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Cameron, Conness, Cragin, Doolittle, Fowler, Harlan, McDonald, Morton, Norton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Sprague, and Tipton—15.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, this is unusual business for the Senate to engage in. The resolution, in the form in which it now stands, selects a passage in the annual message of the President and pronounces a judgment of condemnation upon the sentiments contained in it, upon its language, and upon the proposition generally. What is to follow from it? The Senator from Indiana [Mr. HERRICKS] proposes an amendment declaring, I believe, a doctrine of a party platform. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. CARTER] in the original form of his resolution had a fragment from another party platform. Now, I submit, sir, that our duties are not those of a convention, that our duties are legislative; and that we misspend our time in discussing abstract propositions which are to lead to no immediate action and take no legislative form.

See the result to which we come in this particular instance. It is proposed to select in this resolution a passage in the President's message. He and his friends will insist that that does him great injustice; that you take particular language; you take a sentence or two from his message and you leave out altogether the context; and upon turning to the message myself I am of that opinion; that by your resolution you will not give a fair representation of the President's position. A few paragraphs before the passage cited in the resolution the President commences in this manner:

"Various plans have been proposed for the payment of the public debt. However they may have varied as to the time and mode in which it should be redeemed, there seems to be a general concurrence as to the propriety and justness of a reduction in the present rate of interest."

Then he proceeds to mention that the Secretary of the Treasury has proposed the conversion of the debt into a five per cent. debt or loan, and that other propositions have been made, particularly in a bill passed by Congress at the last session, providing for a four or a four and a half per cent. loan into which the present five-twenty bonds should be converted. Other suggestions, he says, have also been made with reference to this debt and the burden which it imposes upon the people; and then he says further:

"A system that produces such results is justly regarded as favoring a few at the expense of the many, and has led to the further inquiry whether our bondholders, in view of the large profits which they have enjoyed, would themselves be averse to a settlement of our indebtedness upon a plan which would yield them a fair remuneration, and at the same time be just to the tax-payers of the nation."

And then, further on, he states the proposition which is embodied in the resolution before the Senate. In the first reading of his message the idea I obtained was that he proposed that Congress should at once pass a law compelling the public creditor, without any reason whatever assigned on the face of the law or assigned outside of the law, to accept interest for sixteen years, and then that the debt should be considered extinguished; but upon a fair construction it seems to me that his message does not mean that, but, going on and mentioning the various propositions that have been made in Congress and out of it for relieving the people with reference to debt and interest, he suggests that the public creditors, in view of considerations which pertain to the whole subject, may be content to make an arrangement or an adjustment of their claims with the Government. Then he goes on and states simply a proposition, a thing to be considered. The upshot of it is, he suggests whether the creditors may not take into consideration the particular plan which he proposes. Is there any reason for the condemnation of this resolution, in view of that construction of the message? Certainly not. For my part, I think the plan which the President proposes is not one which will be entertained by the public creditors or entertained by the country; that it is not practicable. I am not for it; I am committed against it; but in justice to him let it be understood that it is stated in his message as an addition to the various other propositions which have been made in Congress and out of it in regard to the public debt; and whether it be admissible or not, wise or not, there is no reason for pronouncing, by resolution, condemnation upon it. The Senate condemns the sentiments as well as the matter of the message. We have no business to condemn it. It is not within our jurisdiction to sit in judgment and condemn him in this manner. It might be proper for the Senate to express its own opinion, if it should think proper, in the way of a resolution. The Senate may declare that its opinion is thus and so, although I think we ought to be reluctant to enter upon the passage of resolutions that do not lead to immediate practical action.

I think the Senator from New Jersey therefore spoke without the book when he suggested that the form in which this resolution was reported from the committee was so unobjectionable that everybody would agree to it.

If it were a mere expression of opinion by the Senate upon the subject of paying the public debt it would be one thing. If by reference to the President's message it expressed dissent in its opinion from a proposition contained there, that also would be a matter for fair consideration. But here a fragment of the message is taken out without the context, which will convey to the public and to the world a just view of what the President intended; and then the Senate pronounces judgment of condemnation upon that passage; and, of course, read by itself, without what goes before and explains it, it conveys an incorrect idea altogether of the position which the President takes.

Mr. President, I might go on if the hour were timely and suggest that there have been various other propositions made in regard to the public debt which would fall under precisely the same condemnation which this resolution visits, propositions here in Congress and out of it; propositions based upon the idea that the public creditors and the Government shall adjust their relations with each other by compromise and by agreement. We proposed one bill at the last session which the President did not sign, and various others have been proposed, and the principle upon which they all go, every one of them, is that the Government shall not pay absolutely six per cent. in interest and the principal of the loans in gold; that the creditors shall take something which is less advantageous to them. I agree that this plan proposed in the President's message, so far as I can understand it, is not a practicable or a wise one; I am not for it, but I am opposed to this resolution, which upon insufficient grounds condemns his message, does him injustice; which does not state his position at all; which leaves out the context, which is necessary to go along with the passage cited in the resolution in order to be comprehended.

Sir, it is an embarrassing position in which to be placed, if a gentleman intends to vote, when he agrees in opinion against the proposition mentioned in the resolution, and yet at the same time is precluded from voting for that or assenting to it because of its form and because it does injustice. It seems to me that if the committee that had the subject in charge desired anything that would have a salutary effect upon public opinion, which would fairly express a reasonable view of the Senate, they would have put the resolution in a different form. In the form in which it is I, for one, will not vote for it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I know no instance in the history of the Senate of the United States when a recommendation of the President of the United States has been met by a resolution of condemnation. The Senate will be at a loss to find any resolution of this body condemning simply a mere expression of opinion on the part of the President of the United States.

In the passage from the message of the President which is cited in the resolution he makes no recommendation; he does not in any particular invoke the action of this body; he does not even suggest to you the propriety of any action on your part; but as an individual he makes a suggestion as to what he supposes would be for the interest of the public creditors, as to what he supposes they will be satisfied with; and simply because he has thus expressed an opinion or made a suggestion, without asking you to indorse it either by resolution or by legislative enactment, you hurry through this, the High Council Chamber of the nation, a resolution condemnatory in its character. I doubt, sir, whether in any great legislative body a resolution of this character has ever been passed. What! has it come to this that the chief Executive Officer of the nation, in his communications with this body, shall not be allowed to express an opinion or make a suggestion as to what he supposes would be to the interest of the public and also to the interest of the public creditors without being met by words of condemnation and language of disapprobation?

This is the true situation of this question now before the Senate. Read that message carefully, and I will defy any man to point out in this regard a particle of recommendation on the part of the President or even an intimation that the Senate of the United States as a legislative body ought to take any action upon the suggestion which he makes. Why, sir, he starts out by stating to you distinctly that many suggestions have been made in reference to the manner of discharging the public indebtedness. He reminds you that Congress at its last session passed an act providing for the payment of interest at the rate of four and four and a half per cent. This was one suggestion; it passed this body; it passed the other House of Congress; it went to the President; he withheld his signature from it, and it did not become a law. Then he assumes as a fact that in the judgment of this body and the judgment of the other House of Congress there ought to be an abatement of the public interest, and he assumes that the judgment of Congress in that respect is the judgment of the country. This proposition having received the favorable consideration of Congress, he then makes a suggestion of his own whether, if the public indebtedness were discharged in the manner he suggests in his message, it would not be a better plan and whether it would not meet the approval of the creditors themselves.

And yet, sir, upon the reading of this message in this body, the mere suggestion of the President of the United States was regarded by the body as repudiation. If the suggestion of the President be repudiation, what is the suggestion in a bill passed by Congress of funding the debt at an interest of four and four and a half per cent. except repudiation? The honorable Senator who introduced that bill and this body when they passed it had no idea that in introducing it or passing it they were favoring the doctrine of repudiation; and yet it was a proposition to abate one and a half and two per cent. of the interest on the public debt.

Then, sir, there is no difference in principle between the suggestion of the President of the United States and the solemn enactment of this body. The principle is the same. The question is only as to the abatement of the amount of interest. And yet, sir, after the gentlemen of this body have themselves solemnly voted for a proposition to abate the interest on the public debt one and a half and two per cent., thereby showing their judgment that the people of the country are paying a greater amount of interest than should be exacted from them, they come forward with a condemnatory resolution of the President of the United States when he suggests the same thing and does not even ask their approval, does not ask their indorsement, does not ask them to pass any bill or enact any measure to carry out his views. In condemning him, sir, you condemn yourselves.

It is said that consistency is a jewel. I know that that jewel is not found too frequently in legislative halls; but I should like some gentleman who voted for the bill of the honorable Senator from Ohio, providing that the public debt should draw four or four and a half per cent. interest, to explain to me the difference in principle between the provisions of that bill and the suggestion of the President of the United States. Who condemned you? Who uttered a word against your honor or your honesty? Who believed that in voting for that measure you Senators who gave it your support meant to do a dishonorable act? No one; not even the most rabid political paper in the United States which was opposed to your party and opposed to you politically ever questioned your personal integrity in that act. And yet, sir, proposition after proposition was made in this body after the reading of the message, reflecting not only upon the suggestion of the President of the United States, but reflecting upon his honor in making the suggestions, for one of the resolutions went to the extent of declaring it "dishonest." Before Senators condemn measures or suggestions coming from the Executive of the United States, or from any other source, they ought to calmly and considerably weigh what the suggestions are. When you come to reduce the suggestion to its elements, and to see what there is in it, you find that there is nothing in it except what you voted for yourselves.

However this resolution may be worded, it cannot escape the conviction in the public mind that it is intended not only to condemn the measure, but to reach him who made the suggestion. Repudiation charged against a man who, in his very communication to the body, tells you that the public credit should be sacredly preserved! He, doubtless, was anxious that the public credit should be preserved; and as there were many suggestions being made, and as some of those suggestions had received the favorable consideration of Congress, he makes one that the public credit may be preserved; and the basis of the suggestion, after all, is the consent of the creditor, for he expressly says that the public creditors themselves, in view of the large gains to them from their investment, the large amount of profit which they realized from the investment, may be perfectly willing to agree to a proposition of this kind. Does he say to you, sir, does he say to the country, that if the public creditors are unwilling to accept a proposition of this kind then pass an act compelling them to do so? Not at all. He asks you to pass nothing; he asks you to force nothing on the public creditor; but, sir, having as a wise man and as a student of history pondered the teachings of history, he may have foreseen as he thought, and you may perhaps foresee if you will for a moment think of it, the danger in which a large public debt of this kind may be from exacting principal and interest, the entire amount, without listening to any words of accommodation. To avoid repudiation it is not alone sufficient to pass resolutions expressing the individual opinions of members of this body. To avoid repudiation or great public embarrassment it would be wiser to commence the consideration of those great measures of reform in the administration of Government and in the legislation of Congress which the sufferings of an embarrassed and burdened people imperatively demand.

If you would elevate to the standard of coin your legal-tenders or greenbacks there is a way much more potential for the accomplishment of such a laudable object than passing resolutions through this body. Cease the expenditure of the public money upon measures which you yourselves admitted, were in their inception, of an extraordinary character and for a temporary period. Abolish your miserable Freedmen's Bureau, which has been a blight and curse and disgrace to the country ever since it was established; save the millions that you are taking from the public Treasury in supporting that bureau, an institution as needless as the imagination of man can conceive; cease the rule of Ulysses the First over ten States of this Union, backed up by a large and unnecessary military power; call off the oppressors of the people; do not reward them for their oppression by running your hand into the public Treasury and giving them premiums; see that the taxes which you levy are so reasonable in amount and so just in themselves that the revenue of the country can be collected without the perpetration of such enormous, such extensive, and such numerous frauds, as leave the amount collected almost useless in discharge of the public expenses.

But, sir, gentlemen who are in favor of the measures to which I have alluded are not willing that their reputation for integrity should be tarnished by the possibility of its being believed that they would discharge the public indebtedness, except by paying the whole amount of principal and the whole amount of interest, and some of them are so guarded in reference to their reputation in this behalf that they would pay the whole amount in gold, whether the contract said "pay in gold" or not. Mr. President, I believe in repudiation in no form, in no shape, in public or in private; but I do not believe in making the public pay the public creditors anything more than the public, through their representatives in Congress, have agreed to pay them. There is a large portion of this debt, perhaps two thirds of it, as to which nothing has been said in regard to what it shall be paid in, whether coin or currency. I have no doubt my honorable friend from New Jersey [Mr. CARTELL] would have it all paid in coin. He is a coin man. He knows a great deal more about finances than I do. It is a subject which I never studied much, because I did not think I should ever be able to understand it, never having seen a man in my life that did. [Laughter.] But I wish to suggest to that honorable Senator, and to those who are so generous that they would not only pay off the public creditors according to the contract but pay them off in coin, whether they have ever considered the question where the coin is to come from? The late Mr. Stevens said in the House of Representatives, in a public speech, that this country was indebted to the amount of five billions. Others have said that it amounts to four billions. The published statement makes the ascertained adjusted indebtedness, not including the unascertained or unadjusted indebtedness, to be $2,500,000,000. How are you going to pay it all off in coin, principal and interest?

You are generous. It is a noble feeling which prompts not only to doing justly, but tells you, as you have it in your power, to do more than justly; and you are now to look up the coin with which to pay. How much coin is there in the world? Sir, there are not this day four billions of coin in the whole world; but admit that there are four billions of coin in the whole world, you propose to take four and a half billions of it and leave all the rest of the world with a billion and a half. Modest request! You expect the world to come and bring its treasures to your door to enable you to pay off your patriotic lenders of money, who loaned it, not for their benefit, mind you, if they did lend a greenback worth forty cents on the dollar and get a promise for one hundred cents for it, but for your benefit, to enable you to prosecute a great, glorious, and patriotic war, the objects of which I will not now enter into. Perhaps before the end of the session I may have occasion, on some measure patriotic in its character which you may suggest, to enter into a fuller consideration of that branch of the subject. But do you suppose that out of the four billions of coin in the whole world you are going to get two and a half billions and that the rest of the world is going to be content with two and a half billions? No, sir; however patriotic the impulse may be, and however strong the desire on your part may be so to discharge the public indebtedness, you will find when you want the money to do it that you cannot get it. You will have to resort to some other mode if you discharge it. But you say, perhaps, "We do not propose to do it all now;" but according to the prediction of the honorable and distinguished Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FREELINGHUYSEN] you will do it in about twenty-one years. Now, take the amount of your coinage in the world twenty-one years ago, compare it with the amount of coinage now, and say that it will increase proportionately twenty-one years in the future; suppose you have arrived at that period, if you get enough coin to discharge this public debt will you not get more than your share? Is all the world going to let you have that amount? No. It is simply this; when you attempt to pay the public debt in coin, either now or in future, you will find the coin is not there; you have not that much of the coin of the world for your share; you will never be able to do it, and the consequence will be that your debt will never be paid, because you will never have the wherewithal to pay it.

Oh, but, said the honorable Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FREELINGHUYSEN], the other day, in that beautiful and elegant speech which he made—and he always makes such speeches—"we will find the resources in our waving fields"—I thought he was going to become a poet—"we will find them in our mines; we will find them in the different industrial pursuits of life; and if everything else fails we will find them in the sweat of our brows." Mr. President, I believe it was Artemus Ward who said during the war, to show his patriotism, that he was perfectly willing, as a proof of his devotion to his country, to give every one of his wife's relations to the prosecution of the war. [Laughter.] I do not know that I object to taking the waving fields of New Jersey and the mines of Pennsylvania and the products of the shops of New England and giving them all to discharge this public debt; and I am willing to contribute my part of the public burden, but when it comes to this sweating business I do not sweat, [laughter;] the Senator from New Jersey will not sweat; and the honorable Senator who offered this resolution will not sweat. Whenever it comes to the point of sweating, let me tell you, Mr. President, the great masses of the people will take hold of it, and these public creditors had better now, I will not say take the suggestion of the President, but take some reasonable proposition. They know, as the President says, that they have already got as much as they ever invested. Let them come up and agree to an adjustment before sweating time comes. Do you suppose the people of this country are so in love with this public debt, that they are so sensitive upon the subject, as is either one of the honorable Senators from New Jersey or any member of this body?

Do you not suppose they will hail with delight the time when the tax-gatherer no longer comes around to summon them to the county seat? I live in a very plain, unsophisticated part of the world; they never saw a Federal tax-gatherer before this war; but now men are summoned up to the county seat to tell how much their income is, that they may contribute a portion of it for the benefit of Uncle Sam. Do you not think it will delight their hearts when they find that they have to sweat to help to pay these taxes for the Federal Government? How would they have been wounded in their finer sensibilities if the tax-gatherer had only told them, "Well, now, you need not pay this at all;" and would they not have protested, would they not have asked the privilege of giving part of the fruits of the sweat of their brow for the benefit of the Federal Government?

Sir, the cry of "copperhead" and "traitor," "rebels down South" and "Ku-Klux Klan," and all those things, will soon pass away. You cannot keep up the public excitement very long and for many years so as to control popular elections by such cries. I make no predictions; but I say that four years to come they will not be strong enough to defeat the honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] for Governor, if he wishes to be. And then, when your public debt is not being decreased; when you keep up your standing Army, that costs twice as much now to maintain it as the ordinary average expenses of the General Government were in the past; when navies are kept up; when there is no curtailment of the public expenses; when the people see all this, and when all those things that excited for the moment have passed away and sweating time comes, the great danger is, not that the people are dishonest, but seeing that those whom they intrusted with the management of their affairs and to represent them in the Halls of Congress do not curtail the expenses of the General Government and lessen their burdens, it may be that they may consider, as Livy said when he went to write his history, whether it shall be the price of their labor, whether it shall be the price of their sweat to pay the public debt at all. You know, sir, and so does every other reflecting man know, that if you could separate portions of this public debt from other portions of it, there is a large part of the American people who would to-day not repudiate it, but who would not acknowledge that it ever rightfully existed.

Suppose you could separate that portion of the public debt which was incurred in the legitimate and proper prosecution of the war from that portion of it which had no connection with the legitimate and proper prosecution of the war, and put the question of the payment of the latter to the people of the United States this day, I doubt whether you could predict with certainty the result. Who would pay that portion of the debt (if it could be presented distinctly from any other portion of it) incurred for the military's being sent into States that had never joined in what you called the rebellion, that never gave you any disturbance, to control elections, as they were in my State? I might vote for it, provided I could vote at the same time for a rope to hang the men that sent them.

All these questions may hereafter by some persons be presented for the consideration of the American people. Now, suppose a great financial crash should come, such as this country has undergone in time past, then, from the depths of embarrassment and want and ruin, the people may begin to consider the easiest way to escape; and therefore, says the President in his message, (whether he had any reference to a state of affairs of that kind or not,) it is not always best to exact to the letter the fulfillment of the bond.

But, Mr. President, I will not enter more fully into the discussion of this question now. I do not believe that any person who properly considers the language of the Executive in his message can seriously come to the conclusion that he meant repudiation in any form whatever; but finding that even Congress itself had entertained a proposition for the abatement of the public interest, so that there should not be a rigid compliance with the terms of the bond, he, without recommending Congress to act upon his suggestion, merely suggested this as one of the propositions that might be worthy of consideration here and by the creditors. But, sir, I suppose this resolution will pass. If so, I can see no possible good to come from it. The mere suggestion has not lowered the price of stocks and gold in the market. It has not decreased the value of your bonds. The public are suffering no detriment. The resolution looks too much upon its face, although I do not presume that the honorable Senator who offered it could possibly have meant such a thing, as if it was intended to give a party fling at a retiring President.

I shall enter upon no eulogy of the President. He has done many things which you disapprove. He has not gone far enough in the right direction for me. He is about to go out of public life. Although I have dissented from many measures of his administration, I have approved most of those to which you have taken exception. There is one thing that can with truth be said of him, that starting out in early life with none of the advantages which most of you have had, he has worked himself up by honorable paths to the chief position under this Government, the President of the United States. History, notwithstanding any resolution which you may pass, whether designed for the purposes of reflection or otherwise, will adjudge this of him, that in the trying and embarrassing situation in which he has been placed he acted, to the best of his judgment, a patriotic part. He has given too many evidences in the past of his devotion to the country for it now to be believed that he means that country wrong.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, the passage cited in the resolution now under consideration from the President's message is to my mind very plain. It needs no gloss or comment or interpretation to arrive at its just intention and exact purpose. It recommends to Congress, as a measure proceeding from the executive mind, a recommendation presented to us in the course of his official duties as established by the Constitution, that we should enact by law that the public creditors, the bondholders of the United States, should be deprived of the benefit of the performance of the promise which the Government has made to them in the terms in which it was made. He recommends that henceforth there shall be applied from time to time, from the end of one period of six months to the end of another period of six months, the semi-annual interest accruing upon the bonds of the United States, upon the principal made payable on the face of those bonds, until this application, or rather withholding of the interest of the bonds, shall have absorbed and exhausted and paid the principal of the bonds. That is the executive recommendation; it is in effect and intent a deliberate recommendation to Congress to make a private seizure of the interest accruing upon the public bonds of the United States, and to apply that interest in payment of the principal of the bonds. In other words, it is an attempt on the part of the Executive, by way of recommendation, to repudiate henceforth and reject, refuse to pay—for that is the plain English of it—both the interest and principal of those bonds.

Such, sir, very plainly and very clearly, is the effect and intent of that executive recommendation. It calls upon Congress to refuse to pay the honest debts of the nation.

Gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber do not regard this as a recommendation suggested on the part of the President of the United States. They seem to treat it very plausibly and very kindly, as if it was a mere kindly and benevolent suggestion on the part of the President of the United States. Sir, the Constitution gives to the President, among other powers and among other duties, the power and duty of furnishing information to Congress, from time to time, of the state of the nation, and of recommending to their consideration such measures as he may see fit. He is not authorized by the Constitution to enter upon the business of writing and publishing essays either to Congress or to the public. He is bound up and confined to these two simple duties: furnishing information to Congress, and recommending to Congress such measures as he may see fit. I take it for granted he did not intend in the present instance to depart from the line of what he regarded his constitutional duty, and I therefore take it for granted that it is his deliberate purpose, as President of the United States, to have it understood that he, the President, is opposed to the payment henceforth of either the principal or the interest upon the bonds of the United States.

This recommendation goes the entire length of repudiating and sweeping out of existence the honorable obligations due from this Government to its creditors, who, in its hour of need, came generously and patriotically forward and loaned their money to carry on the war to put down the rebellion. Now, sir, I would not upon every trifling occasion express an opinion upon the recommendations of the President; but when he, acting under the Constitution, lays before the Congress of the United States, and causes to be published at home and abroad, this outright, sweeping, unblushing piece of practical piracy, if it shall ever be carried out, then I hold that it becomes my duty as a Senator of the United States to raise my voice against his and to condemn so piratical a recommendation. Had this proceeded from any private person, had it proceeded from any other public functionary, it would have carried with it far less weight than it does now. How will it be looked upon abroad by the creditors of the Government who may happen to read it? And I trust in God they will be very few who will take that trouble; they certainly will not if they know the man as well as I think I know him. But this recommendation will go abroad; it will be understood by the public creditors abroad as an expression, to some extent at least, of the purpose of the American people to repudiate their honest debts. I need not say, sir, what effect it may have abroad or what effect it may have at home.

I hold it therefore, sir, to be our bounden duty, as constituting the legislative power of the nation, to rebuke in limine this attempt to repudiate the debts of the United States; and I am by no means persuaded, by the remarks of the gentlemen upon the other side, that we are committing the high and grave crime of disrespect toward Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, when we say in reply to that foul recommendation—that is a harsh term, perhaps, but I think it very well deserved—that it is no better than a recommendation of piracy and public robbery; for it is, after all, a recommendation to seize and confiscate into the Treasury of the United States moneys which honestly and justly belong to the honest creditors of the United States.

Mr. DIXON obtained the floor.

Mr. NYE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. ANTHONY. If it is the pleasure of the Senate to adjourn I beg to suggest that it is desirable that there should be a short executive session.

Mr. SUMNER. Can we not get a vote?

Mr. DIXON. To test the sense of the Senate as to whether they wish to hear me this evening in the few remarks I have to make, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. CATTELL. I hope the Senate will not adjourn.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope the Senator from Connecticut will withdraw his motion so that we may have an executive session. There is some executive business that we ought to do.

Mr. DIXON. I withdraw the motion to adjourn with the understanding that I have the floor on this question.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, December 16, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock m.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Indefinite leave of absence was granted to Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania, on account of sickness.

CLERK TO COMMITTEE ON REVISION OF LAWS.

Mr. POLAND, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Revision of the Laws of the United States be authorized to employ a clerk, who shall be allowed the same compensation as the clerk to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. McKEE. I would like to make one suggestion to the gentleman from Vermont. I am not objecting to the resolution. I am in favor of allowing the committee a clerk. I entirely agree with the chairman of the committee on that point. But I suggest to him that in order to carry out what was agreed on in the committee the compensation should be limited to the time that Congress is in session. We ought not to create a salaried office for the year.

Mr. SPALDING. It is so now.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that it will expire on the 4th of March next.

The resolution was then agreed to.

Mr. POLAND moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INVALID PENSIONS.

Mr. MILLER. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to furnish for the information of the House a list of the names of all invalid pensioners placed on the roll since 1861 from disabilities incurred in the service of the United States during the war for the suppression of the rebellion, with their residence or address; and that he also designate in said list the names of those who still continue to receive pensions, and the rate per month.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I object.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. WILLIAM G. MOORE, his Private Secretary.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSOURI.

Mr. PILE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to furnish this House with any reports made by officers of the engineer department with reference to the bridge across the Missouri river at Kansas City, Missouri.

RIGHTS OF AMERICAN CITIZENS ABROAD.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas this House, by a resolution adopted June 15, 1868, has declared that Messrs. Warren and Costello, American citizens, now held under penal servitude in English prisons, were "convicted and sentenced in Great Britain for words and acts spoken and done in this country, by ignoring our naturalization laws;" and whereas the Secretary of State of the United States has, in a dispatch to Mr. Moran, our charge d'affaires at London, which was read to Lord Stanley, the English foreign secretary, by said Moran, July 9, 1868, stated that the correspondence of our legation at London is full of remonstrances and expostulations which, by the President's direction, he, the said Secretary of State, had addressed to her Majesty's Government against the imprisonment of Messrs. Warren and Costello, which said remonstrances and expostulations seem to be neglected and despised by her said Majesty's Government; and whereas a member of this House from the State of Ohio on the 3d day of February, 1868, declared that if Messrs. Warren and Costello were tried and imprisoned in England for words and acts spoken and done within our jurisdiction it concerned the peace of the Republic, and more, that it involved the honor of the Commonwealth; and whereas on the said 3d of February, 1868, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs and said member of this House from Ohio protested against this matter going to the Executive, as it was a matter exclusively for congressional action; and whereas the official report of Warren's trial was communicated to this House, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed on the 10th day of February, 1868, now ten months ago, clearly proving that Messrs. Warren and Costello were tried, and convicted in Dublin for words and acts done and spoken in the United States, as alleged in the resolution of this House of June 15, 1868, and which has been denied by Lord Stanley; and whereas no report has been made by any committee of this House, and no notice has been taken by this House for these ten months of this matter, involving not only the peace of our Republic, but the honor of the Commonwealth; and whereas a resolution involving the facts herein alleged was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs over ten months ago, upon which no report has since been made: Therefore,
Be it resolved by this House, That a select committee of seven members be, and the same hereby is, appointed to examine into this matter, and report forthwith to this House whether any American citizens have been tried and convicted in Great Britain for words and acts spoken or done in the United States or by ignoring our naturalization laws, and to recommend by bill or otherwise such measures as will vindicate the honor of the Commonwealth.

Mr. BINGHAM. I must object to this preamble and resolution, unless they are referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. ROBINSON. I shall not consent to anything going to that committee, and therefore I withdraw the resolution.

NITRO-GLYCERINE, PETROLEUM, ETC.

Mr. ELIOT, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1554) prohibiting the carriage as freight in passenger vessels of nitro-glycerine, petroleum, or other explosive substances; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

REMOVAL OF DISABILITIES.

Mr. PAINE, from the Committee on Reconstruction, which is authorized to report at any time, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1556) to relieve Andrew Ramsay, W. L. Heriotz, William J. Mixson, William A. McDaniels, James Harrison, John H. Goodwin, Johnson J. Knox, J. J. Klein, John W. Burbridge, Charles B. Farmer, and George Buist from all political disabilities imposed by the fourteenth article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which was read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. PAINE. I have been instructed by the Committee on Reconstruction to ask that this bill be considered at this time. I send to the Clerk's desk to be read a statement relating to the persons named in this bill, signed by the Representatives from the State of South Carolina in this House.

The Clerk read as follows:

The persons named in this bill are loyal men, have been elected to various positions, and unless they qualify before January 1st their offices cannot be filled except by a new election, as the offices they have been elected to are elective and not appointive. They are men worthy to have their disabilities removed.

B. F. WHITEMORE,
Member of Congress First District.
C. C. BOWEN,
Member of Congress Second District.
SIMEON CURLEY,
Member of Congress Third District.
JAMES H. GOSS,
Member of Congress Fourth District.

Mr. PAINE. The statement just read shows the reason why we desire to make this an exceptional case, and ask for legislation now. It is that unless these gentlemen are relieved from disabilities before the 1st day of January next the offices to which they have been elected will be vacated. For that reason we have placed them in a separate bill. I will add that these gentlemen are all citizens of the State of South Carolina; the names of citizens of no other State being placed in the bill.

I send to the Clerk's desk, and ask to have printed in the Globe, some documents relating to some of these gentlemen. I now yield the floor to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks,] my colleague on the committee.

Mr. BROOKS. I was about to suggest that all these documents should be printed. I will also add, while I am up, that we who are in the minority of the committee from which this bill is reported, though cognizant of the fact that these persons are almost all of one political party, yet hope that the day will soon come, now that universal male negro suffrage exists in the South, when universal white male suffrage will also be permitted there.

The papers referred to by Mr. PAINE are as follows:

GREENVILLE COURT-HOUSE, SOUTH CAROLINA,
December 11, 1868.

SIR: Having been elected school commissioner of our county, I cannot qualify because of political disabilities. Will you be so kind as to take the proper measures to have my disabilities removed by Congress?

Yours, very respectfully,

JAMES HARRISON.

Hon. J. M. ALLEN, Senator.

FRIEND WHITEMORE: Please do all you can in this matter; also, that of John H. Goodwin and W. A. McDaniel, as it is necessary that these gentlemen should be able to qualify under the act or resolution introduced by you at the last session, that was to extend the time to qualify until the 1st of January, 1869.

Respectfully, yours, &c.,

JAMES M. ALLEN.

I am not personally acquainted with the parties named in this communication. They have been elected on the Republican ticket, and are recommended by Hon. James M. Allen, State senator, and postmaster at Greenville, South Carolina, and I can safely indorse his recommendations.

B. F. WHITEMORE,
Member of Congress First District South Carolina.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COLUMBIA, SOUTH CAROLINA, December 12, 1868.
DEAR SIR: Yours of the 10th instant has just come to hand. In reply I write to inform you that Mr. W. J. Mixson was before the war a magistrate, and at the commencement of the war he enlisted as a private and remained in the confederate army about three months. He was the first, and, for some time, the only white man in Barwell who supported the reconstruction acts. He has from the passage of those acts faithfully labored for the success of the Republican party. As an acknowledgment of his merit he was elected as a member of the General Assembly. Do have his disabilities removed as soon as possible.

Yours, truly,

R. B. ELLIOTT.

Hon. B. F. WHITEMORE.

MECHANICSVILLE POST OFFICE.

SUMTER COUNTY, S. C., December 12, 1868.

DEAR SIR: Having had the pleasure of making your acquaintance some time ago at Mr. Coghan's, in Sumter, I have taken the liberty of asking a favor of you, namely: that you will press my claims for the removal of my disabilities, which are simply these: that I unfortunately some ten or fifteen years ago was a member of the Legislature, and went into the confederate army. I have acted from the beginning to the end faithfully with the Republican party in furthering all of their views, and was the only white man in my neighborhood who would act with the Republican party in the hour of its greatest need. I assisted in the election for members for convention, its ratification, and for all of its nominations, and acted at our polls as magistrate at all of its elections to preserve peace and order. Should reference be required I will give you the voters of Sumter county as proof, and also of my stand with the party. My petition from South Carolina Legislature, I have been informed by Mr. Coghan, our senator, was unanimous, and was forwarded to Congress last fall just before it took its recess. Please give it your earliest attention and oblige.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant, &c.,

R. LA ROCHE HERIOTZ.

Hon. B. F. WHITEMORE.

Please let me hear from you, and oblige, very respectfully,

R. L. H.

Mr. PAINE. I will now call the previous question.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Will the gentleman withdraw that motion for a moment?

Mr. PAINE. Very well.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I desire to ask the gentleman to allow me to move an amendment to this bill, to add the name of De Witt C. Senter, of Tennessee. The committee have directed me to report a bill for his relief.

Mr. PAINE. I feel authorized to allow the amendment to be offered.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Mr. Senter is now the Lieutenant Governor of Tennessee, and will soon be obliged to take the oath of Governor.

The SPEAKER. As the bill comes from a committee, the amendment cannot be accepted. It will be regarded as pending.

Mr. PAINE. I now demand the previous question on the bill and pending amendment.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment of Mr. FARNSWORTH was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question being taken on the passage of the bill, it was passed, two thirds voting in favor thereof.

Mr. PAINE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. PAINE, the title of the bill was amended so as to read, "An act to relieve certain persons therein named from all political disabilities imposed by the fourteenth article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States."

MILITIA IN SOUTHERN STATES.

Mr. PAINE also reported back, from the Committee on Reconstruction, a bill (H. R. No. 1537) to repeal certain provisions of section six of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1867, and demanded the previous question.

The question was on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill, which was read, provides for the repeal of section six of the act named in the title, so far as the same is applicable to the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Florida, Alabama, and Louisiana.

Mr. BROOKS. I think my colleague on the committee [Mr. PAINE] owes to the House some exposition of a bill of such importance as this before calling for summary action upon it.

Mr. PAINE. I will state to the House the object we have in presenting this bill. By section six of the act of March 2, 1867, it was provided that in the lately rebellious States no militia should be organized or maintained. That provision is still in force, although several of those States have been restored to their relations to the Federal Government. The repeal of the provision becomes necessary in order to remove an obstruction to the organization and maintenance of the State militia in those States as the State militia is maintained in other States of the Union. A bill of this kind has, I believe, been already passed by the Senate; and it seems to me no one can have any objection to such a measure.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to make an inquiry of my colleague, [Mr. PAINE.]

Mr. PAINE. I withdraw the demand for the previous question to enable my colleague to make his inquiry.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I observe that the State of Georgia is omitted from this bill. I desire to inquire the reason for this omission? It seems to me that that State is in the same situation as the others, and ought not to be excluded from the benefits of this measure.

Mr. PAINE. In response to the inquiry of my colleague I will state the reason why Georgia is omitted. I am not sure that I should be in favor finally of excluding Georgia from the operation of a measure of this kind; but it will be remembered that there is now pending before Congress an inquiry as to the condition of things in Georgia; and this fact made it questionable whether we should at this stage of the session include Georgia in a bill of this kind. It was deemed best to postpone action with reference to that State until the questions in regard to that community shall have been examined and reported upon, and then to act upon the case of Georgia in a separate bill. So far as I am concerned, I rather think I shall in due time be in favor of including Georgia in a bill of this kind.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I wish to inquire whether it is the purpose of the committee making this report to reconstruct Georgia again, or whether it is considered as sufficiently reconstructed?

Mr. PAINE. The instructions which I received from the committee this morning did not embrace that subject.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I hope we will have read the section that it is proposed to repeal.

Mr. BECK. I simply desire to make a statement.

Mr. PAINE. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. BECK. A bill of this character, as I see by the Globe, passed the Senate yesterday, and as one of the members of the Reconstruction Committee I think this bill should be postponed for the present. The Senate bill brings up the whole question as to all of the States, and having already passed the Senate and now coming to this House, I think it better this bill should not be acted on, but that we should wait for the Senate bill.

Mr. PAINE. I will send to the Clerk's table, to be read, section six, which it is proposed to repeal. In reply to my colleague on the committee, [Mr. BECK,] I will say that it will be impossible for us to regulate our legislation in the way he suggests. If our bill first reaches the Senate it may be first acted on, and if their bill first reaches us it may first be acted on.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That all militia forces now organized or in service in either of the States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Louisiana, Mississippi, and Texas be forthwith disbanded, and that the further organization, arming, or calling into service of the said militia forces, or any part thereof, is hereby prohibited, under any circumstances whatever, until the same shall be authorized by Congress.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I ask my colleague to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. PAINE. I will yield to my colleague.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I will vote for this bill, but at the same time I do not want to be put upon the record as agreeing to the doctrine that Congress may prevent States from organizing militia.

Mr. PAINE. Of course, then, the gentleman will vote for this bill, which repeals a provision involving that doctrine. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PAINE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REVENUE STEAMER S. P. CHASE.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 387) to authorize the removal of the revenue steamer S. P. Chase from Lake Ontario to the sea-board; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

DISTILLED SPIRITS AND TOBACCO.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee of Ways and Means a bill (H. R. No. 1555) to amend an act entitled "An act imposing taxes on distilled spirits and tobacco, and for other purposes," approved July 20, 1868. It should be passed, if at all, before the holidays.

There was no objection; and the bill was received and read a first and second time.

It amends section seventy-eight of the act indicated by striking out "1st day of January," and inserting "15th day of February."

Mr. SCHENCK. I demand the previous question, unless some explanation is required.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REDUCTION OF OFFICERS.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State, of the Treasury, of the Department of War, of the Navy, of the Interior, the Attorney General, and the Postmaster General be, and are hereby, directed to report to this House, as soon as practicable, what reduction can be made, compatible with the public interests, in the number of officers and employés, salaries and expenses in their respective Departments, or in the service connected therewith.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested to transmit to this House the report of the special commissioners to examine into the character of the work on the Union Pacific railroad, and to inform the House what attempts, if any, have been made on the part of said railroad company to obtain money from the Government for building said road without having constructed the same in conformity to existing law; and also to further inform the House the amount of bonds issued to said railroad company, and if a sufficient amount has been retained in the hands of the Government to guaranty its completion as a first-class road, in further accordance with the existing law.

DRAWING FOR SEATS.

Mr. ROSS. I rise to a privileged question. I offer for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk of this Houseshall, at one o'clock p. m. on Wednesday, the 16th day of December, A. D. 1868, place in a box the name of each Member and Delegate of the House of Representatives, written on a piece of paper; that he then proceed in the presence of the House to draw from said box, one at a time, the said slips of paper, and as each is drawn he shall announce the name of the Member or Delegate upon it, who shall choose his seat for the present session: Provided, That before said drawing shall commence the Speaker shall cause each seat to be vacated, and shall see that every seat continues vacant until it is selected under this order; and that every seat, after having been selected, shall be deemed vacant if left unoccupied before the calling of the roll is finished.

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules, as he has done heretofore, that a resolution for the drawing of seats at each session is a privileged question. It is for the House to determine whether it will or will not draw for seats.

Mr. ROSS. There are twenty five or thirty new members who have had no chance to draw seats, and it is but justice to them to give them the opportunity. I demand the previous question.

Mr. DAWES. I desire to ask the gentleman—

Mr. ROSS. I object to anything else intervening, because the time will soon expire for the resolution to go into operation.

The SPEAKER. Does the inquiry of the gentleman from Massachusetts relate to this proposition?

Mr. DAWES. It does not. The Committee of Elections desire me to report a short bill, to which I presume no one will object, which it is necessary, if it pass, shall go through before the recess. That is all.

Mr. ROSS. I demand the previous question.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. I move that the resolution be laid on the table.

Mr. ROSS. I will modify the resolution by inserting after "one o'clock" the words "or as soon as this resolution is agreed to."

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, if the previous question is not seconded, will it be in order to move to proceed to a drawing for seats every Monday morning? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. If the previous question is not seconded it would be.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. I desire to ask a question of the Chair. On this question I think the Delegates from the Territories ought to have the right to vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that according to uniform usage they will not be entitled to vote, not being Representatives from States.

The question being put on laying the resolution on the table, there were—ayes 83, noes 72.

Mr. ROSS demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 88, nays 84, not voting 49; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Archer, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Baldwin, Barnum, Beaman, Beck, Benjamin, Bingham, Boutwell, Boyer, Brownell, Burr, Benjamin F. Butler, Chanler, Reader W. So the resolution was laid on the table.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was laid on the table, and to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I demand the yeas and nays on the latter motion.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I withdraw the motion.

TESTIMONY IN CONTESTED ELECTIONS.

Mr. DAWES. I desire the permission of the House to report from the Committee of Elections a short bill, to which I presume there will be no objection. It is desirable, if it passes at all, that it should pass before the recess, in order that the benefits of it may be had by those who desire it to be passed. It is a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to prescribe the mode of obtaining evidence in cases of contested elections," approved February 19, 1851.

The bill was read for information. It proposes to authorize the register in bankruptcy resident in any congressional district, the right to represent which is contested, to take testimony and perform any of the other acts which a judge of any court of the United States is authorized to do by the third section of an act entitled "An act to prescribe the mode of obtaining evidence in cases of contested elections."

Mr. WOOD. I object to that, most decidedly.

Mr. DAWES. If the gentleman will listen to me, I will state to him the occasion for the passage of the bill, and I think he will have no objection.

Mr. WOOD. If the gentleman from Massachusetts will permit me to make but one remark in opposition to this measure, I am satisfied that he himself will see its impolicy and impropriety.

Mr. DAWES. I will listen to the gentleman.

THE SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Wood] reserves the right to object.

Mr. WOOD. The proposition, as I understand it, is to place in the hands of these registers the same powers as are now exercised by judges under the existing law.

Mr. DAWES. That is not the intention of it. The intention is to add the register to the number of officers prescribed. I will tell the gentleman the difficulty that has existed heretofore in such places, for instance, as the city of New York, where there are half a dozen districts in the city. The law requires the officer to reside in the district. Well, the judge of the United States court for the whole city may not reside in the district. It is not the intention of the bill to take away from the officers now prescribed by law any authority which they now have, but only to add to them the register of bankruptcy.

Mr. WOOD. The objection in my mind to this proposition is that it places this whole power in the hands of members of one political party. I believe that all the officers in the United States to whom it is proposed to give this power belong to one political party, and I think that is a fatal objection to the proposition.

Mr. DAWES. Whether these registers be all of one political party or not I am not advised; but this bill does not propose to compel either side to go before this register. One side, for instance, might go before the register and the other side go before any one of the other persons named in the act, as they could do as the law stands now. But there have been contests in districts where it has been impossible to find the particular officer named in the act resident in the district, and the parties have had to come to Congress to get special authority for some individual to take the testimony.

Now, while the Committee of Elections do not desire to force the parties before the register of insolvency or to compel them to take their testimony before one particular individual—and they have drawn the act on purpose to avoid that—they desire to afford facilities to them all by adding the register of insolvency to the list of officers before whom the testimony may be taken. He is authorized by law to administer oaths, and is an officer supposed by the committee to be particularly suitable to take the testimony. He will not, of course, be resorted to unless it is more convenient to take testimony before him than before one of these judges, and nobody can be compelled to take testimony before him when there are any other of the officers resident in the district. That is the purport of it.

Mr. WOOD. Another objection which strikes me to this measure is that these officers are temporary officers, appointed under the existing bankrupt law, and at the expiration of the operation of that law these officers will necessarily go out of existence as such.

Mr. DAWES. The answer to that is twofold; the bankrupt law is a standing law as much as any other law, and if it should expire or be repealed it would leave this statute precisely as it is to-day, so that it would embarrass nobody.

Mr. WOOD. Every bankrupt law that this Government has ever enacted has been but a temporary measure for temporary purposes, and in every instance—and we have had several of them—they have ceased after an operation of two or three years.

Mr. DAWES. If that should be the fate of this law it would cause no embarrassment, for every contestant would have precisely the same privileges and rights that he has now if that law should be repealed and the registers become extinct.

Mr. WOOD. I must object to the introduction and consideration of this bill at this time. At a subsequent period, Mr. Wood withdrew his objection.

The bill (H. R. No. 1558) was then introduced, and read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. McKEE. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] yield to allow me to amend the bill by inserting the words "notaries public?"

Mr. DAWES. The committee had under consideration the question whether this power should be extended to notaries public, and they thought that every facility would be furnished by adding the registers in bankruptcy to those now named in the law, and we were not desirous to give that authority to everybody. Therefore, as representing the committee, I should not be willing to have the amendment offered which has been suggested by the gentleman.

Mr. McKEE. Will the gentleman allow me to offer the amendment in order that it may be voted upon by the House? The gentleman is aware that in the Kentucky contested-election cases we were obliged to go some hundreds of miles before we could get our testimony taken. Unless this amendment is made, there will be a necessity perhaps of taking a register in bankruptcy, and compelling him to travel in some cases a distance of two hundred miles.

Mr. DAWES. Nobody is confined, under this bill, to the register in bankruptcy in any district. Besides that officer he will have half a dozen other officers upon whom to call for that service. If notaries public are included in the bill it will add hundreds of officers to those now covered by the bill. In many districts there are a hundred notaries public; I venture to say that in New York city alone there are a thousand of them. The committee are unwilling to extend the list of officers so far, for there would be danger that in some instances this matter would be brought before improper officers. If in practice it should be found necessary to extend the list of officers it can then be done. But I am not willing to have it extended in the direction proposed. I therefore decline to yield for that purpose, and call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONSTANCE BATEMAN AND OTHERS.

Mr. KELSEY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1557) for the relief of Constance Bateman, Augustine de Caidry, and Julia L. Wamaling; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

SLAVE-HOLDING IN KENTUCKY.

Mr. JULIAN. I ask unanimous consent to introduce for consideration at this time the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas it is alleged, on good authority, that thousands of colored people in the State of Kentucky are now actually held as slaves by their former owners; and whereas many of these persons are children, ignorant of their rights and unable to defend them, and many others are too poor to employ counsel and meet the expenses of litigating their rights in the Federal courts, and hundreds of miles distant: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the appointment by competent authority of United States commissioners in convenient and suitable localities, with power to issue writs of habeas corpus, and to hear and determine applications and causes involving such illegal slave-holding, and that said committee report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky. I object.

Mr. BECK. I also object; for the reason that the statements therein made are incorrect.

CERTIFIED CHECKS—NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. PRICE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting to this House, at as early a day as practicable, a bill prohibiting under a severe penalty any national bank from certifying any check unless the maker of such check has on deposit and subject to draft in such bank at the time of such certifying the funds necessary to meet the same.

MINNESOTA LAND DISTRICT.

Mr. DONNELLY, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 888) explanatory of the act to create an additional land office in the State of Minnesota, approved July 25, 1868; which was read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed and read a third time.

The joint resolution, which was read, provides that the limits of the land district, as designated in the act entitled "An act to create an additional land district in the State of Minnesota," approved July 25, 1868, to wit: all that part of the northwestern land district which lies north of township No. 124 north, and west of range No. 35 west of the fifth principal meridian, shall be construed to embrace all the land north of township No. 124 and west of said range No. 35.

Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Speaker, I think that after a brief explanation there will be no objection to the passage of this bill.

At the last session Congress passed a bill creating a new land district in the State of Minnesota. That bill, which was prepared by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, was passed in the form prepared by him. The language of it was as follows:

"And to establish an additional land district in the State of Minnesota, embracing all that part of the northwestern land district which lies north of township No. 124 north."

It appears that the old northwestern land district did not extend down to the line of township No. 124 north, but only to township No. 128, so that there was an inconsistency or an ambiguity in the language of the bill in defining the boundaries of the district; in consequence of which the bill passed at the last session has not gone into effect. The land office has been established; the officers appointed and commissioned by the President, and confirmed by the Senate; but in consequence of the ambiguity I have mentioned the work cannot be proceeded with. The result is that the settlers in that region of country have now to travel through the snow in many instances one hundred miles farther than would be necessary if this incongruity in the act of last session were remedied.

The bill which has just been read by the Clerk has been prepared by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and sent to me accompanied by a letter, which I ask may be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
GENERAL LAND OFFICE, December 15, 1868.

SIR: In reply to yours of this morning, I state that the act of July 25, 1868, creating the Alexandria district in Minnesota, directs that the district shall embrace all that part of the present northwestern district lying north of township No. 124, &c.

As the southern line of the northwestern district is the township line dividing No. 123 and No. 129, the law would require that as the limit, while the naming of township No. 124 shows an evident intention to make that the southern boundary.

Senator RAMSEY called to-day, and the matter was explained to him, and at his request we prepared a joint resolution, of which the inclosed is a copy, and which we have transmitted to him. I have no doubt the passage of this resolution will fully relieve the difficulty. I also inclose copy of the original act.

I am, sir, very respectfully,

J. S. WILSON,
Commissioner.

Hon. IGNATIUS DONNELLY, House of Representatives.

Mr. DONNELLY. I will add that I have conferred with seven of the nine members of the Committee on the Public Lands, and they are all in favor of the bill, and ask that it may be considered and passed at this time.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DONNELLY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS DELAWARE RIVER.

Mr. O'NEILL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1559) giving the consent of the United States to the erection of a bridge across the Delaware river, between Philadelphia and Camden; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

RELIEF FROM POLITICAL DISABILITIES.

Mr. SYPHER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1560) to relieve from disabilities James T. Ward and John L. Lewis, citizens of Louisiana; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Reconstruction.

COMPOUNDING OF LIQUORS.

Mr. VAN WYCK, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1561) subjecting compounders of liquors to the same provisions as rectifiers; also prohibiting compounding establishments within six hundred feet of a distillery, the same as rectifying establishments; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

HEIRS OF MATTHEW SZEGADY.

Mr. PILE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Accounts be instructed to examine the claim of the legal representatives of Matthew Szegady, deceased, late a folder under the Doorkeeper, and to allow thereon such sum, not exceeding two months' pay, as may be just and proper.

PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That in the judgment of this House, whenever the public lands of the United States be disincumbered of Indian title, said lands should be immediately opened for settlement under existing laws, or under such rules and regulations as Congress may prescribe, and that the sale of Indian lands to corporations and speculators by treaty stipulations is contrary to sound public policy and in derogation of the rights of the masses of the people.

Mr. MAYNARD. I object.

PARAGUAY.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Such has always been the custom when a member is in the city sick.

There was no objection; and it was ordered accordingly.

The drawing was then completed.

MONUMENT ANTHRACITE RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. MORRELL. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill to incorporate the Monument Anthracite Railroad Company, for reference to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, December 17, 1868.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read.

Mr. SHERMAN. I notice that the Secretary in making up the Journal has fallen into the same error that occurs in the morning papers in relation to the report made from the Committee on Finance yesterday on the joint resolution (S. R. No. 66) pledging the faith of the United States for the payment of the public debt in coin or its equivalent. I reported back the joint resolution referred to with a recommendation that it lie on the table. I probably was not heard by the Secretary. I ask that that amendment to the Journal be made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That correction will be made.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 1558) to amend an act entitled "An act to prescribe the mode of obtaining evidence in case of contested elections," approved February 19, 1851, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

LAND DISTRICT IN MINNESOTA.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 388) explanatory of an act to create an additional land office in the State of Minnesota, approved July 25, 1868, was read twice by its title.

Mr. RAMSEY. As that resolution simply removes an ambiguity in the description of the district I hope the Senate will pass it at once.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It provides that the limits of the land district, as designated in the act entitled "An act to create an additional land district in the State of Minnesota," approved July 25, 1868; to wit, all that part of the northwestern land district which lies north of township No. 124 north, and west of range No. 35, west of the fifth principal meridian, shall be construed to embrace all the land north of township No. 124 and west of range No. 35.

Mr. POMEROY. As I understand this resolution it corrects the boundary of the land district. Is that all?

Mr. RAMSEY. That is all.

Mr. POMEROY. Then I have no objection to it.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I present the petition of Andrew Tracy and thirty or forty other lawyers, of the State of Vermont, with the indorsement of the judge of that district, asking for a provision of law for an additional term of the United States courts in that district. I ought to say, perhaps, that Mr. Tracy, the first petitioner, is deceased, having died since the petition was sent here. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY presented a petition of citizens of Indiana, praying that in any amendment to the Constitution to extend or regulate suffrage there be no distinction between men and women; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the petition of W. F. Nelson, hospital chaplain United States Army, praying that he may be compensated for quarters not furnished by the Government; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of soldiers in the war of 1812, praying to be allowed pensions; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Ohio, praying that pensions be granted to the surviving soldiers of the war of 1812; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. COLE presented the memorial of Thomas E. Truworthy, praying an appropriation of $100,000 to him for the purpose of removing obstructions to the navigation of the Colorado river; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. VAN WINKLE presented the petition of John Russell, a soldier of 1812, for arrears of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a memorial of J. V. Cushing, guardian of Joseph Moorehead, praying that he may be admitted into the Naval and Military Asylum for the Insane at Washington, District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer two petitions from members of the bar in Mississippi, in which they ask that the place of holding the United States courts be changed by law so that the courts may hereafter be held in the city of Vicksburg, the commercial center of the State; and they present reasons at length for the proposed change. I move the reference of these two petitions to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING presented a petition of citizens of Florida, praying the removal of the political disabilities imposed on Dr. J. R. Kelley by acts of Congress; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

TOBACCO STAMPS.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Committee on Finance have directed me to report back the bill (H. R. No. 1555) to amend an act entitled "An act imposing taxes on distilled spirits and tobacco, and for other purposes," approved July 30, 1868. I desire to say that to accomplish the purpose the bill must be passed at once. It merely extends the time for affixing stamps on tobacco from the 1st of January next to the 15th of February. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

By unanimous consent the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to amend the seventy-eighth section of an act imposing taxes on distilled spirits and tobacco, and for other purposes, approved July 20, 1868, by striking out the words "first day of January," wherever they occur in that section, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "fifteenth day of February."

Mr. COLE. I desire to inquire of the chairman of the committee if it is not desirable to extend still further the time fixed by this bill. I think that an extension until the 15th of February will be hardly sufficient for the purposes of the Pacific coast.

Mr. SHERMAN. A longer time was proposed by persons interested, but on the whole it was thought best not to change the bill. There will be time enough for further legislation, if any should be needed, before the 15th of February. The bill must be passed to day to be effective, and the probability is that there will not be a quorum of the other House to act on an amendment.

Mr. COLE. If it endangers the passage of the bill I will withhold the amendment which I was about to offer. I should like to have an opportunity to offer the amendment; but, as the chairman of the committee thinks it will endanger the passage of the bill, I will not urge it.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REMOVAL OF DISABILITIES.

Mr. SAWYER. I move to take up for consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1556) to relieve certain persons of all political disabilities imposed by the fourteenth article of the Constitution of the United States.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to provide (two thirds of each House concurring therein) that all political disabilities imposed by the fourteenth article of the amendments of the Constitution of the United States upon the following citizens of South Carolina: Andrew Ramsey, of Edgefield county; W. L. Hewit, of Sumter county; William A. McDaniels, James Harrison, and John H. Goodwin, of Greenville county; William J. Mixson, of Barnwell county; Johnson J. Knox, of Sumter county; J. J. Klein, John W. Burbridge, and Charles B. Farmer, of Colleton county; George Buist, of Charleston county, and Dewitt C. Senter, of Granger county, Tennessee, on account of participation in the recent rebellion, be removed.

Mr. SAWYER. I offer an amendment to the bill, which I send to the desk.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to insert after the words "Charleston county," in the twelfth line, the following names:

A. L. McCaslan and William Hill, of Abbeville county; John F. Porteous, of Beaufort county; C. W. McFadden, of Chester county; R. H. Edmunds, of Fairfield county; Alexander McBee, H. M. Smith, and William E. Earle, of Greenville county; W. H. Langston, of Laurens county; John C. Secresh, of Lancaster county; Julius L. Shanklin, of Oconee county; Thompson H. Cooke, George Boliver, and William N. Mount, of Orangeburg county; Spartan D. Goodlett, R. E. Holcombe, John W. Singleton, L. N. Robins, and James E. Hagood, of Pickens county; John Heart and William H. Talley, of Richland county; P. Quin Camp and A. E. Smith, of Spartanburg county; R. L. Meriot, of Sumter county; and Charles W. Geddes, of Charleston county, South Carolina; Edward Cantwell, of Hanover county, and W. J. Clarke, of Craven county, North Carolina.

Mr. SAWYER. I will say in regard to the names from South Carolina which are included in the amendment that they are names which have all been passed upon by the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate and reported on favorably by that committee, and they are offered here as an amendment for the purpose of gaining time. It is necessary that the disabilities should be removed from these persons before the recess, in order to enable them to qualify for offices to which they have been elected before the 1st of January. There are no names in the amendment, with the exception of the last two, which have not been passed on by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, and those two I was requested to add by the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. STEWART. I desire to inquire of the Senator from South Carolina if the new names in the bill that comes from the other House are known to him?

Mr. SAWYER. The names in the bill that came from the House are known to the members of the House of Representatives from South Carolina, indorsed by them, and recommended by the Legislature of the State.

Mr. STEWART. All recommended by the Legislature?

Mr. SAWYER. So I understand from the members of the House.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill having been read three times, the question is, Shall it pass? On the passage of the bill the yeas and nays will be taken.

Mr. POMEROY. It may be done by unanimous consent, I suppose, without ordering the yeas and nays.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I would gladly, Mr. President, vote to relieve all the people of the South from disabilities. I think it ought to be done. While I know nothing about these gentlemen, personally or politically, and must act on information, I shall not vote for the bill; and for this reason: I have seen it stated in the public press—and I presume it to be correct—that the persons applying, or in whose behalf application is made for the removal of disabilities here, are persons belonging to one particular political organization. I object to their being made favorites in the legislation of Congress. If they have incurred disabilities then they have been guilty of that which their neighbors have been guilty of, and no reason is stated to the Senate why this favor should be extended exclusively to them. I hold that it is not wise in legislation to legislate simply in reference to the party associations or political convictions of individuals. I do not know of any particular merit, and I have heard no particular merit of these gentlemen stated which should cause them to receive this favor, while their neighbors, who have been no worse than they, who have not participated in the late civil war to a greater extent, perhaps, than they have, who did not give aid and comfort to the southern confederacy or to persons in arms against the United States to any greater extent than they have, are excluded. Why should these be favored and the rest excluded? I make this statement merely to place myself aright, as I intend to vote against this and all kindred measures partial in their character.

Mr. SAWYER. I desire to say, in regard to some of the parties whose names are in the bill before the Senate, that they are not members of the Republican party, but they are men who were selected by the votes of their several localities to fill important local offices; and where we were not able to get a good Republican we took a good Democrat who was willing to recognize the existing state of things. There are several gentlemen included here who are known as members of the Democratic party, but they are those who have put themselves in proper relations with the existing government of the State. Our Legislature has not confined its recommendation for the removal of disabilities to men of one political party, and this bill includes several names of prominent Democrats in that State.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill; and, as the Constitution requires the concurrence of two thirds of the members present to pass it, the vote must be taken by yeas and nays.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 44, nays 3; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Anthony, Cameron, Cat-tell, Chandler, Cole, Corbett, Cragin, Dixon, Edmunds, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Harlan, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Kellogg, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Norton, Nye, Osborn, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Pool, Ramsey, Rice, Robertson, Ross, Sawyer, Sherman, Spencer, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Van Winkle, Vickers, Warner, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—44.

NAYS—Messrs. Davis, McCreery, and Saulsbury—3.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Buckalew, Conkling, Conness, Doolittle, Drake, Fessenden, Fowler, Harris, Henderson, McDonald, Morton, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Wade, Welch, Whyte, and Willey—19.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Two thirds of the members present having voted in the affirmative, the bill is passed.

Mr. FERRY. The title of the bill should be changed by inserting the words "of amendments" after "article," so as to read: "A bill to relieve certain persons of all political disabilities imposed by the fourteenth article of amendments of the Constitution of the United States."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The title will be so amended.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CHANDLER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 697) granting lands to the States of Wisconsin and Michigan to aid in the construction of the Wisconsin and Lake Superior railroad and its branch; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HARRIS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 698) to relieve from legal and political disabilities certain persons engaged in the late rebellion; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BAYARD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 699) for the relief of the daughters of General Charles F. Smith, deceased; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHERMAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 700) for the relief of Joseph Moorehead; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SPENCER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 701) granting to the New Orleans, Mobile, and Chattanooga Railroad Company the right of way through the public lands of the United States and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RICE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 702) for the removal of political disabilities from certain citizens of the State of Arkansas; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 703) for the removal of political disabilities from certain citizens of the State of Kentucky; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FERRY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 704) to extend the letters-patent originally granted to John Young; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. McCREERY. I submit resolutions amending the Constitution of the United States. I am not the author of these resolutions myself. They were prepared by Hon. S. S. Nicholas, of Louisville, Kentucky, a man who for fifty years has been an ornament to the bar and bench of Kentucky. He had devoted much time to the consideration of constitutional questions, and the result of his experience and reflection is embodied in these resolutions. I therefore commend them to the consideration of the committee to which they will be referred. They are intended to protect the rights of minorities and to provide against the contingency of bringing an election for President and Vice President to the House of Representatives. I move that the resolutions be printed and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By unanimous consent leave was granted to introduce the joint resolution (S. R. No. 189) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; and it was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. POMEROY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 190) relating to the bounties to colored soldiers who entered the volunteer service as slaves; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TRUMBULL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 705) further to provide for giving effect to treaty stipulations between this and foreign Governments for the extradition of criminals; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The bill has been examined by the Judiciary Committee, and I ask that it take its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go on the Calendar.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that it be printed. The motion was agreed to.

MILITIA IN THE SOUTHERN STATES.

Mr. WILSON. The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1537) to repeal certain provisions of section six of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1867, have directed me to report it back without amendment and recommend its passage; and I ask to have it considered at once. It will take but a moment. It is precisely similar to the bill which we passed the other day on the same subject.

There being no objection the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. HOWARD. I should like to hear some explanation of this bill from the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WILSON. We passed a similar bill the other day—the Senator was not here at the time—which was fully debated. It went to the House of Representatives, but the House at the same time, or the day after, passed this bill, and as they are engaged to-day in such a way that they cannot act upon our bill I thought I would have this bill taken up and put on its passage.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOSEPH MOOREHEAD.

Mr. GRIMES. The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 700) for the relief of Joseph Moorehead, have directed me to report it back without amendment, and to recommend its passage; and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] desires that I should ask the Senate to consider it now.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is the case of a lunatic who is now at large on account of the lunatic asylum in Ohio being burnt out. It is important that it should pass in order to allow an ex-officer of the Navy to be transferred to the lunatic asylum here. I hope it will be allowed to pass at once.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, which provides that Joseph Moorehead, of Ohio, lately a passed midshipman in the United States Navy, now insane, shall be admitted as a patient into the Naval and Military Asylum for the Insane at Washington, District of Columbia, and remain therein so long as he shall continue insane and his guardian shall so desire.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. GRIMES. I desire simply to say that on the 16th of February, 1853, Congress passed a law agreeing to pay to the guardian of Joseph Moorehead the furlough pay of a passed midshipman from some time in the year 1840, and so long as he should remain insane. He has been confined in the Ohio Insane Asylum, which has now been burnt out, and this bill simply authorizes the Secretary of the Navy to transfer him to the asylum in this District.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPORT OF COLUMBIAN INSTITUTION.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move to reconsider the resolution passed yesterday authorizing the printing of fifteen hundred extra copies of the report of the superintendent of the Columbian Institution for the Deaf and Dumb, with a view to recommit it to the Committee on Printing. Some circumstances have come to my knowledge that I was not aware of at that time.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move to recommit the resolution to the Committee on Printing.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS RECOMMITTED.

On motion by Mr. MORGAN, the bill (H. R. No. 375) to repeal an act approved March 2, 1867, entitled "An act to regulate the disposition of fines, penalties, and forfeitures received under the laws relating to the customs, and for other purposes," and to amend certain acts for the prevention and punishment of frauds on the revenue and for the prevention of smuggling, was recommitted to the Committee on Commerce.

On motion by Mr. MORGAN, the bill (S. No. 490) for the relief of the owners of the brig Ocean Belle was read a second time, and recommitted to the Committee on Finance.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 375) donating condemned cannon for the erection of a monument to Major General Kearny; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate.

SYMPATHY TO SPAIN.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. No. 178) tendering sympathy and best wishes to the people of Spain.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. SUMNER. It is only necessary to read the substitute reported by the committee.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations; which was to strike out all of the resolution after the resolving clause, and to insert the following:

That the people of the United States, sympathizing with the people of Spain in their effort to establish a new order of things, express the confident hope that it will be conducted to the end in such way as to promote the triumph of liberal institutions, and they earnestly appeal to the people of Spain not to allow the present opportunity to pass without securing the immediate emancipation of slaves and the final abolition of slavery throughout the Spanish dominions.

Sec. 2. And he it further resolved, That the President of the United States is charged with the duty of communicating this resolution to the Government of Spain.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY. I suppose the Senator from Massachusetts has carefully considered these words; but it may not be so much of a congratulation to establish a new order of things as it would be to establish a republican form of government.

Mr. SUMNER. Would you insert "republican government?"

Mr. POMEROY. I want a republican government. If we are going to congratulate them let us congratulate them on their opportunity of establishing a republican government. A new order of things may make it worse on the whole.

Mr. CONNESS. I was going to make a suggestion in this connection. I would suggest that the words "a more popular form of government" might be adopted, or "more enlightened and liberal institutions;" something that expresses the idea of a government like our own.

Mr. POMEROY. I like the phrase "representative republican government."

Mr. CONNESS. That, perhaps, may be going too far.

Mr. POMEROY. I made the suggestion to the Senator from Massachusetts, thinking he would adopt it.

Mr. SUMNER. It is not in my power precisely to adopt it, for this is the report of the committee. The resolution as I introduced it the Senator has before him, and that has been amended by the committee, and it is the amendment of the committee which is now under consideration. If the suggestion of the Senator should prevail it strikes me it would come in at a different part of the resolution; that instead of saying "the triumph of liberal institutions," we should say "the triumph of republican institutions."

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, the committee thought that it would not be exactly in good taste, especially in the present unsettled state of things in Spain and considering the institutions that prevail among European Governments, to attempt to hint what particular form of government we should most desire. That is, of course, very well understood. The expression "a new order of things" does not exactly suit me. I would suggest to the chairman whether the expression "a more liberal form of government" simply would not be sufficient and as far as we ought to go.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I am opposed myself to the adoption either of the amendment or of the resolution. It makes very little difference, in my judgment, which the Senate choose to adopt. I will state very briefly—I did not know the question would come up this morning—the grounds on which I shall object to said resolution. They are impracticable in their character. They are an interference with a course of things in another country which is now in a state of revolution—successful revolution, if you will—but still what do you know of the condition of things in Spain? You know that there are two parties there, one in favor of monarchy and the other in favor of a republic. You know that they have had conflicts there since the revolution took place in which the late sovereign of Spain was deposed. Why should the United States depart from the policy which ought always to characterize it, of non-interference with the affairs of foreign nations? Why not leave Spain to decide both as to the form of government the people choose to adopt and as to the mode in which they choose to regulate their domestic institutions of any kind whatever?

My objection is not to the particular request or approbation which is indicated in this resolution or to the expression of the hope that Spain may abolish slavery throughout her dominions. My objection arises from the fact that the precedent in itself is impracticable and contrary to that principle of non-interference in the domestic affairs of foreign communities which I think always ought to be adhered to in this country, as it generally has in the past. If you make a precedent of this kind what may follow? Other questions may arise in other countries on which you may have very strong sentiments or opinions in this country; and you may ultimately by resolutions of this character, which are not legislation in your own affairs, which have no practical bearing upon the people of this country in any way whatever, involve the country and complicate its relations with foreign Powers.

Let me illustrate by a case which is not probable now, I admit, but I do not know how soon it may become probable. We know that in Great Britain there is a contest going on now for the disestablishment of what is called the Irish Church. It is not at all improbable that in the course of things there it may ultimately lead also to a contest for the disestablishment of the Church of England. In this country we do not recognize established churches in any form whatever. The general system of the people of this country is against it. I can see no reason why we might not just as well, in a political crisis there connected with the disestablishment of the church, pass resolutions in reference to what we might hope the action of England would be in reference to matters of that kind as in reference to the course of Spain now.

My judgment is to let foreign countries manage their own institutions and their own affairs, recognizing always the de facto Government where it is fully established; but beyond that the path of wisdom, the act of statesmanship on the part of the Government of the United States, is not to interfere in the domestic matters of foreign communities where they do not by their management trespass upon us.

This is the general ground on which I object to this resolution in any shape in which it may be presented. I cannot see that it is called for. We do know, and all we know is that there is a disturbed state of affairs in Spain, the issue of which no man here has any sufficient knowledge now to predict. It may end, as I have understood is most probable, in the establishment of a monarchy. It may be different. It may end in civil conflict and further anarchy. We do not know. Why should we interfere, then? I object to it not because Spain could at all injure us, or that we complicate our relations with Spain, but we establish a precedent by this interference, and though the men of the day here now in this Senate may consider that it is very desirable that Spain should do what this resolution asks, in the Senate hereafter other questions relating to other nations may arise in which a majority may be equally devoted to some particular opinion which they may seek to enforce upon a foreign nation and may do it to the extent of complicating the relations of the country.

I have stated the general ground on which I object to resolutions of this character altogether. I do not think them appropriate legislation. I think them dangerous legislation as a precedent; much more so than any effect this particular resolution might have in any way whatever. I am therefore opposed to the passage of such resolutions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it is the duty of the Chair to announce that the resolution of the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. WILLEY,] in relation to a portion of the President's message relating to the finances, is before the Senate.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope the Senate will indulge me by taking a vote on this joint resolution. I think there will be no further discussion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the special order will be passed over for the purpose of taking the vote on this joint resolution.

Mr. CATTELL. This joint resolution will lead to further debate, and I ask that the unfinished business of yesterday be now taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made to laying aside the unfinished business it will be taken up.

Mr. POMEROY. Let it be laid aside informally.

Mr. SUMNER. Let us finish this.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business will be laid aside informally if there be no objection.

Mr. CATTELL. I must object.

Mr. SUMNER. I appeal to the Senator to allow five minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts can test the matter by submitting a motion to the Senate.

Mr. SUMNER. I do not wish to submit a motion. I ask the indulgence of the Senate merely for five minutes that this may be disposed of. I think it can be disposed of in that time.

Mr. CATTELL. I have no objection to allowing five minutes; but Senators all around me say it cannot be disposed of in that time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate postpone the special order informally?

Mr. SUMNER. For five minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to that? None being made, Senate joint resolution No. 178 is pending.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator from Maine made a suggestion to substitute instead of "new order of things" the words "more liberal form of government." I have no objection to the substitution. If he makes it in the form of a motion I certainly shall be ready to accept it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARNER. I move to insert in place of the word "liberal" the word "republican." This is simply an expression of sympathy; and it seems to me that we cannot do less than express our sympathy in the form I propose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Alabama is not now in order, inasmuch as the proposition which he moves to amend has been agreed to in a different form. The question now is on the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. THAYER. Is it not in order to amend the resolution?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly it is.

Mr. THAYER. I move to amend by striking out in the seventh line the words "promote the triumph of liberal institutions" and insert "secure the establishment of a republican form of government," so as to read, "express the confident hope that it will be continued to the end in such way as to secure the establishment of a republican form of government." Does the Senator from Massachusetts object to that?

Mr. WARNER. Did I understand the Chair to decide that the proposition was not now open to amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is open to amendment, but not precisely to the amendment offered by the Senator, because the very matter which he wishes to strike out has already been agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to state to gentlemen who have made these suggestions that the matter of them was very considerably discussed in committee, and the committee, I believe, came to the unanimous conclusion that it would not be proper at all for us to recommend to the people of Spain any particular form of government. That is a matter for them to settle. Suppose the British Parliament should pass a resolution recommending to them not to establish a popular or republican form of government; we should think that it was an impertinent interference. Suppose the legislative department of any other Government should pass a resolution or recommendation of the same kind, should we consider it proper? The committee thought that, in conducting matters of this sort, if we interfered at all, it was as well to be governed by good taste, and not undertake to dictate to a European Power in that way or to suggest what particular form of government they should adopt. It is to be supposed that the people of Spain know what is most for their own interest; and, at any rate, it is advisable for us, in the present condition of things, to wait. But, inasmuch as the effort is making evidently to improve their condition, we thought there could be no impropriety in recommending to them to adopt more liberal institutions, or liberal institutions generally, leaving to them to decide what particular form of liberal institutions they would adopt. I really hope we shall not be guilty of what I should consider very bad taste in passing a resolution suggesting to them as a matter of advice what particular form of government they should adopt; and the committee, as I said before, were unanimous on that subject; but I believe there is no objection on the part of any one to the amendment that has been already made by the Senate with the consent of the chairman.

Mr. SUMNER. I have to say that, personally, if my wishes could prevail, there would be a republican government in Spain, and I think that ancient monarchy will err much in this crisis of her history if she fails to secure a republican government; and if my voice could reach those who have now influence over her destinies it would be to tell them not to hesitate in the path of duty. So much I say for myself; but while ready to say thus much for myself, I do not undertake to advise Congress to say what I would say. I united with the committee in the report which has been made. I believed that at this time, under all circumstances, considering the case carefully, it would be, perhaps, more prudent, more wise, and certainly more in conformity with the usages of nations, for Congress not to undertake to make any recommendation with regard to the form of government. But it certainly does belong to Congress to express always, everywhere, and to every nation, its aspirations for liberal institutions. Those are expressed in this resolution.

Now, I think that my friend from Nebraska cannot be more fervid in this cause than I am; I think that he is not ready to go further than I am; but perhaps he has not sufficiently considered all the reasons and the motives for a more cautious and prudent form of expression. I submit most respectfully to him that he should review his judgment on this question, and perhaps he may be disposed to withdraw his proposition.

Mr. CATTELL. The five minutes have elapsed, and I must insist on the special order.

Mr. THAYER. I will withdraw my amendment in order that the vote may be taken.

Mr. SUMNER. Let us have a vote.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time for which the unfinished business of yesterday was postponed has expired, and the Chair must be governed by the action of the Senate. This joint resolution must be laid aside and the unfinished business of yesterday taken up.

PAPER WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. HOWE, it was Ordered, That the papers relating to the claim of the Mercantile Mutual Insurance Company of New York for eight $1,000 legal-tender notes be withdrawn from the files of the Senate.

NATIONAL DEBT.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Senate, properly cherishing and upholding the good faith and honor of the nation, do hereby utterly disapprove of and condemn the sentiments and proposition contained in so much of the late annual message of the President of the United States as reads as follows: "It may be assumed that the holders of our securities have already received upon their bonds a larger amount than their original investment, measured by a gold standard. Upon this statement of facts it would seem but just and equitable that the six per cent. interest now paid by the Government should be applied to the reduction of the principal in semi-annual installments, which in sixteen years and eight months would liquidate the entire national debt. Six per cent. in gold would at present rates be equal to nine per cent. in currency, and equivalent to the payment of the debt one and a half time in a fraction less than seventeen years. This, in connection with all the other advantages derived from their investment, would afford to the public creditors a fair and liberal compensation for the use of their capital, and with this they should be satisfied. The lessons of the past admonish the lender that it is not well to be over anxious in exacting from the borrower rigid compliance with the letter of the bond."

Mr. DIXON addressed the Senate. [His speech will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. FERRY. Mr. President, my colleague has taken the opportunity, in the course of his remarks upon the resolution now pending before the Senate, to discuss the resolution, to make a financial speech and to establish, in his own judgment, a charge of inconsistency against myself.

Mr. DIXON. The latter was not my object.

Mr. FERRY. Now, sir, I thought in the remarks which I had the honor to address to the Senate the other day that I showed, with some degree of clearness, the altered state of circumstances at the present time from what they were at the time the fourteenth constitutional amendment was proposed, which altered state of circumstances was the main foundation upon which I rested my argument for the present removal of political disabilities created by the fourteenth article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States. What was the condition of things two years ago when you were discussing that matter here in the Senate of the United States? I was not here.

Mr. DIXON. One year ago.

Mr. FERRY. In May, 1866, you were discussing that constitutional amendment. In that month it was agreed to in the Senate. In the next month it was promulgated to the people of the United States for their ratification; and what was the condition of things? That southern oligarchy to which I referred in my speech the other day, which had led the masses of the southern people originally into the rebellion, and which at the close of the rebellion felt itself crushed to the dust and then was willing to receive any terms which the conqueror might see fit to impose, had been lifted up from that position by the President whom the Senator followed, and by the efforts of the Senator himself, so far as they went, in sustaining the President. That same oligarchy had shown conclusively, by its conduct upon the encouragement thus received from the President and from his immediate supporters, that they were unfit, in the transition period which was to intervene before the final restoration of those States to the Union, to be intrusted with political power which they had so abused in misleading the mass of the southern communities in the years then but lately gone by; and to prevent the danger of the efforts which that class of the people of the South might make to put off still longer that restoration of the Union which all loyal men sought for these disabilities were imposed upon them by the amendment to the Constitution, and imposed, as was said fully and expressly in the debates of the period, two years ago, solely for a temporary purpose. And the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] in his speech on that occasion hoped that the time might soon arrive when all these disabilities could be wiped away.

That was the condition of things then. They were a dangerous element in the southern communities. They were an element then unfit to be intrusted with political power, because the political power which they might be intrusted with would in the circumstances of those communities at that time be dangerous to the speedy restoration of the Union and the safety of the Republic. Well, what has happened since? Your constitutional amendment has been approved by the people. Your reconstruction acts have been sanctioned by the people. Seven States have come back to the Union under the operation of those laws. The others are inevitably to return within a year from the present time. And, more potent than all this, the people of this country at the ballot-box have clearly and unmistakably expressed such a determination that the malice of the ancient southern oligarchy cannot fail to understand, for whether they can understand generosity and magnanimity or not there is one thing that the mind of the southern oligarchy does comprehend. It does understand force, and the people of the nation have incarnated the force of the Republic in the person of the great general whom they have placed at the head of this Government for the next four years. It is, in my judgment, no longer in the power of that oligarchy to prevent the restoration of the Union in the shortest possible period; it is no longer in their power to revive discord and civil strife in those communities; and therefore, even though they may be hostile still, even though they may be sullen and discontented, in my judgment it is safer for those States, in my judgment it is safer for the Republic, that they should cease to be considered by the communities in which they live, or a portion of those communities, as a sort of martyrs to a "lost cause;" and it is my judgment that they will lose their fictitious importance by being restored to the ordinary privileges of American citizenship.

But I gave another reason why I was in favor now of removing these disabilities. Believing that the danger no longer exists, believing that this great experiment of a democratic free government is now moving forward to a successful conclusion, I wish to have nothing whatever to mar the harmony of the system. For the identical reason that I favor the enfranchisement of the American, be he black or white, all over this land; for the very reason that I believe in an amendment to the Constitution of the United States which shall prevent henceforth the distinction of color being made applicable to the exercise of the franchise, for that very reason am I willing now to extend the franchise to the recent rebel. It is better that the negro citizen of this land should be endowed with all the political rights of citizenship than that he should be kept a pariah closed, as I said in my speech the other day, deprived of self-respect and left open to the assaults of vice. It is better for him, it is better for the State, it is better for the Republic; and for the same reason is it better also that the class at the South whose capacity of doing injury is now taken from them should be restored to the exercise of the ordinary capacities of American citizenship.

I have but one word more to utter. With regard to an amendment of the Constitution of the United States removing the distinctions of color now existing in different States of the Republic I had certainly hoped that my colleague would be willing to stand side by side with me in the support of it. I knew that he had twice in my State voted with me for a constitutional amendment there to extend the franchise to the negro; and I ask what difference is there between an amendment to the constitution of my State and an amendment to the Constitution of the United States for the purpose of accomplishing the same object?

My colleague says he will have no objection to the amendment or its submission to the people of Connecticut if it can be submitted to them assembled in a convention elected for that purpose.

Mr. DIXON. Not that I have no objection, but that it ought to be done in that way.

Mr. FERRY. The implication was, at any rate, that in that mode it would be less objectionable to my colleague. I say to my colleague that I will meet him in the State of Connecticut before the people of Connecticut in the election of a convention by the people of Connecticut for the very purpose of deciding on this question; and I believe that that State will give a greater majority for an amendment to the Constitution of the United States to wipe out these odious distinctions than she has given to either political party for the last twenty years; for the people of Connecticut, variable and changing as they may have been in politics during the last twenty years, are yet a liberty-loving, democratic people. They have been taught to base the foundations of civil society upon the very broadest base. They govern themselves in their town meetings and believe in true democracy, and not in that kind of Democracy to which my colleague has lately allied himself. I think that when the period shall come that people will express themselves overwhelmingly in favor of the removal of these discriminations, whether it be done by an amendment to the constitution of Connecticut or an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, my colleague says that the people of Connecticut are a liberty loving people, and that if this question could be presented to them they would of their own will and accord amend their own constitution and grant to every citizen of the State the right of suffrage. If that be so, why not leave it to the people of Connecticut? Why must it be said now and hereafter that it was necessary to use extraneous force upon the people of Connecticut for the purpose of accomplishing an object which he considers so desirable? for the Senator knows very well that by the plan proposed by him suffrage may be enforced upon Connecticut against her will, and she may possibly vote against it for that reason.

Mr. FERRY. I should like to ask my colleague whether the promulgation to the people of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States is an enforcing of legislation upon the people of any particular State?

Mr. DIXON. It may not be under all circumstances, but under certain circumstances it may be. Suppose Connecticut, for instance, should vote against it and every other State in the Union vote for it, I ask, then, if in a certain sense it would not be enforced upon her?

Mr. FERRY. In no improper sense.

Mr. DIXON. I prefer leaving it to Connecticut to decide for herself; and that was the substance of Dr. Bacon's letter. He said he was in favor of negro suffrage, but preferred that the negroes should never vote rather than that negro suffrage should be forced upon Connecticut by act of Congress; and you may say the same thing of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

But, not to dwell on that, I did not desire, Mr. President, to show the inconsistency of my colleague. I desired merely to show that he had advanced to a noble position and to congratulate him upon that advance, and I did it in good faith.

There is one word more which I wish to say, in order to set myself right on the financial question; otherwise, perhaps, I might be misunderstood. I said I doubted the possibility of enforcing or establishing specie payments by legislation. I do not mean by that to say that I shall vote against a bill for that purpose. I am so anxious to accomplish it that I am prepared to vote for a proper bill for that purpose; for the bill of the Senator from Indiana, if it is amended and somewhat improved, if that is deemed the best bill, or for the bill of the Senator from Massachusetts. I consider a restoration of specie payment desirable in every respect, and particularly so for my section of the country.

Now, Mr. President, I desire to move an amendment to the pending resolution. After the word "nation" I move to insert "and agreeing with the President in the sentiment expressed in his message that 'the national faith should be sacredly observed.'" I wish to insert these words for the purpose of showing that the President is not a repudiator, but that all the departments of this Government agree in that sentiment.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, the amendment just offered by the Senator from Connecticut is not in perfect accordance with the real sentiment of the message, which it is the object of the resolution itself to condemn. I took occasion yesterday to say a few words as to the real purpose and intent of the President in the passage which is embodied in the resolution now before us, and showed, as I think, that that intent was plainly one of repudiation. I think so still, sir; and if the Senate will bear with me for a moment I will endeavor to make my proposition perhaps somewhat clearer by reading the context of the message itself.

It is said that the Executive, in the message before us, intends only to leave it optional with the public creditor whether he shall be paid the amount of his bond in the manner pointed out by the Executive; that it is to be a matter of stipulation between the Government and the creditor; that the creditor shall consider himself paid fully the amount of his obligation by the application of the semi-annual interest upon his bond until that application shall extinguish the principal of the bond as well as the interest. That, to me, is a very singular kind of option; it is taking the lion's share: no, sir, it is taking more than the lion's share; it is taking the whole of the game at one fell swoop, and leaving nothing for the creditor.

Now, what does President Johnson say in this message? I call the especial attention of my friend from Connecticut to his language, in order that he may determine for himself whether the Executive holds out to the public creditor an option to be paid in that very singular manner; that is to say, he shall have the option that he shall not be paid at all! The message reads as follows:

"Our national credit should be sacredly observed."

And how is it going to be observed according to this message? He proceeds to say:

"It may be assumed that the holders of our securities have already received upon their bonds a larger amount than their original investment, measured by a gold standard."

This is the assumption of the President in his message; this is the state of facts upon which he bases his subsequent recommendation, which I will now read:

"Upon this statement of facts it would seem but just and equitable that the six per cent. interest now paid by the Government should be applied to the reduction of the principal in semi-annual installments, which in sixteen years and eight months would liquidate the entire national debt."

President Johnson says that this would be a just and equitable adjustment of the public debt due upon the public bonds of the United States. "Just and equitable" is the language of the message. But he proceeds further in a subsequent paragraph, and says:

"If provision be made for the payment of the indebtedness of the Government in the manner suggested our nation will rapidly recover its wonted prosperity."

Now, sir, I can draw but one inference from this language; and that is, that he recommends the passage of an act of Congress by which the bonds of the public creditors should be paid by the semi-annual application of the interest upon the principal of the bond until that principal becomes paid and extinguished. What other meaning can be given to it? He had no right, as I remarked yesterday, to send a message to Congress unless it was for the purpose of giving information to Congress upon the state of the Union, or of recommending measures for the action of Congress, in the language of the Constitution; and here is as plain a recommendation of a measure to be passed and perfected by Congress as is to be found in any message of any President of the United States, and it goes to the entire extent of sweeping away at one blow, at one dash of the legislative pen, the whole bonded indebtedness of the United States, principal and interest together. This is what Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, recommends to be done by the Congress of the United States; and I cannot suffer his friends and advocates here to make their escape from the odium of this proposition by placing upon it any gloss or interpretation which neither the passage nor the context will bear. The President complacently remarks:

"If provision be made for the payment of the indebtedness of the Government in the manner suggested our nation will rapidly recover its wonted prosperity."

Well, it would be a most undesirable kind of prosperity, rather, perhaps, notoriety, for the Government of a great nation just emerging from one of the bloodiest wars in the history of the human race, by which liberty itself has been saved, to turn around coolly upon its creditors, who have aided and assisted in achieving this great triumph, and say to them, "We are very much obliged to you for the use of your money, but we do not choose hereafter to pay you one cent for it. We are the law-making power as well as one of the contracting parties; and we see fit, in the exercise of our omnipotence as a legislative body, to repudiate these loans which, in our distress, we humbled ourselves almost upon our knees and begged from the creditors who are now clamoring for their pay."

Sir, there is no true national prosperity that can arise from such an act as the President has seen fit to recommend to Congress. Instead of prosperity it would be one of the deepest of national humiliations; it would be a disgrace to the American nation which, with all its industry, all its intelligence, and all its boasted virtues, it could not wipe out for four centuries to come. He remarks, also:

"The lessons of the past admonish the lender that it is not well to be over anxious in exacting from the borrower rigid compliance with the letter of the bond."

What does that mean? Will my honorable friend from Connecticut tell me what is intended by that mystic passage? It may be a little mystic to him. I fancy he will find it such if he attempts to explain it. But there is no mystery about it to me. It is a plain admission that the purpose of this recommendation is to repudiate and get rid of the public debt and not perform the public obligation as it is written on the bond.

Now, I am entirely willing that Mr. Johnson should enjoy all the credit and all the renown that is likely to be derived from this recommendation; and I know of no man in the United States more deserving of the equivocal honor of being the parent of that recommendation than the present President of the United States. I say it, sir, with sorrow and humility. That is all I have to say in reply to the interpretation which my honorable friend from Connecticut has endeavored to place upon the message.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, the Senator has called upon me to explain the sentence which he has read, which he declares mystical. I meant to allude to it in the first place. It seems to me it throws some light on this question. The question now is, it seems, whether the President intended to recommend a compulsory scheme. The honorable Senator from Michigan says he did. I do not read it so. If I thought he did I should entirely dissent from it. If I supposed that this was a compulsory plan I should say that the plan was still more objectionable than I think it to be, although I have already explained, or attempted to explain, that it is not by any means what the Senator declares it to be, actual repudiation of the entire debt. I have already shown by arithmetical figures that a long annuity of thirty or forty years is a better proposition for the creditor than reducing the interest to four per cent. and finally paying the capital. The Senator will not deny that. The Senator will not deny that an annuity of forty years at six per cent. instead of seventeen or twenty years, is worth more to the creditor and is more liberal on the part of the Government than offering a bond, the capital of which shall be paid at the end, and four per cent. interest on it during the time. He knows that very well. He has not forgotten his arithmetic. He can cipher. All that it requires to see that is a bare knowledge of arithmetic. If the President had made such a proposition, then it would appear plain that it was to be not compulsory, but optional. But because it is less favorable for the creditor than that they therefore say it is compulsory. That does not follow at all. Because it is an objectionable proposition, and one which the bondholder will not accept, it does not follow that it is intended to be compulsory.

Now, sir, in the first place I think it is not to be presumed that the President would offer to this Congress a proposition for the compulsory settlement of the debt in that manner. It must be plain and apparent and not matter of reasoning that he intended it to be compulsory, or you cannot infer it, because he is not the man, I think, whatever else may be said of him, to propose to the Congress of the United States an act of compulsory repudiation.

But what does he say? The Senator refers to his language. I think his language and the whole context ought to be referred to; and I find that in speaking of this very proposition he says the bondholders may not be averse to it. What does that mean? It may be unwise, it may be foolish, it may even be weak for him to suppose that the bondholders may not be averse to it; but the fact that he says so shows that that was in his contemplation. He might have said that the bondholders would not be averse to an entire relinquishment of their claim, and he hoped they would have the patriotism to do it; that would not be repudiation. Now, he says they may not be averse to it. He says the public faith must be preserved, and then he goes on to suggest a plan which requires the reasoning powers of the Senator from Michigan to make out as compulsory. I cannot see that it is a compulsory plan. I do not think he so intended it; but even as it is, that is a question of construction. The Senator may think so; I may not think so. He may think worse of Mr. Johnson than I do. I may have that opinion of him that I will not believe, except on his express declaration, that he would propose a compulsory scheme of this kind; but, at any rate, whether compulsory or not, the resolution being in bare condemnation of the proposition as a wise scheme, I can unite with my friend from Michigan in voting that it is unwise and that I disapprove of it; but in so doing I do not by any means mean to admit that I think the President of the United States intended to propose it as a compulsory scheme.

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. President, the recommendation of the President of the United States to the Congress of the United States is in these words: referring to the advantages of the loan by the creditor to the Government, he says:

"This, in connection with all the other advantages derived from their investment, would afford to the public creditors a fair and liberal compensation for the use of their capital, and with this they should be satisfied."

Thus intimating to the Congress of the United States that we should enact such a law as to compel the creditor to accept the terms he indicates. He then proceeds to say:

"The lessons of the past admonish the lender that it is not well to be over anxious in exacting from the borrower rigid compliance with the letter of the bond."

This smacks very strongly of a threat to the bondholder that if he does not accept these terms Congress will enact such laws as will compel him to accept them. These terms are very different from those proposed by the Congress of the United States at the last session. The Committee on Finance then reported a bill giving to the bondholder the option of funding his debt into a long loan at four or four and a half per cent., giving him a long period in which he should enjoy that interest, provided he would fund his short bond, maturing in fifteen or twenty years, in a long loan. It was supposed that this long loan would compensate the bondholders to a certain extent for the relinquishment of their present bonds, having but a short time to run, at a larger rate of interest. Consequently, the committee reported a bill giving the option to the bondholder to fund his bond into such a loan if he desired it; otherwise, he could hold that bond until it matured and then receive his money.

In this connection it may not be improper to refer to our citizens who have invested in these loans. The patriotic people who came forward at the commencement of this rebellion with their means to sustain the Government held real estate and other property that was as good to them as gold, and some of them, I know, sold their property in order to enable them to help the Government. I know of one citizen who disposed of $100,000 worth of property that he might assist the Government of the United States. He invested that money in the bonds of the United States, and said, "If the Government goes down let my bonds go, but if it is ever able to pay, then I expect it will pay them in full in gold." He sold real estate in New York city which has since increased in value from two hundred to three hundred per cent. The property that he sold for $100,000 is worth to-day from two hundred thousand to three hundred thousand dollars. That property was probably sold to those who had not faith in the Government of the United States that it would ever pay this debt. Some of his friends said to him, "You will never get a cent of the money that you loan to the United States Government." Those who had not faith in the Government, the men who were not favorable to carrying on the war and who were opposed to assisting the Government in that hour of its great need, bought his real estate and have reaped this profit from it; and now here is a proposition from the President of the United States to the friends of the Government, the men who furnished it with the means to carry on the war for the benefit of the Army and for the protection of their lives and property, absolutely to repudiate the entire debt.

Sir, there are many other securities which are paying as large an interest as the present bonds of the United States. The President's figuring does not appear to be exactly right. The bonds, on the average, in the United States that are bearing six per cent. interest are worth about one hundred and ten at this time. Gold is now at about thirty-five per cent. premium. Thirty-three and one third per cent. would be just eight per cent. per annum upon the gold. These bonds at one hundred and ten would give about seven and three-tenths per cent. interest in currency. The bonds of the State of Tennessee are now worth about sixty-five or sixty-seven in the market. Those bonds are now paying six per cent. in currency on their par value. Would the President, who is a citizen of that State, recommend to the State of Tennessee such a proposition as this? Would he say to the citizens there, "After you have paid the amount of your bonds in interest you should repudiate the balance?" Those bonds are paying on the market value about nine per cent., one and one half per cent. at least greater than the bonds of the United States. Many of our citizens have invested in those bonds. If the President, on returning to Tennessee, should recommend such a measure as this in that State, what do you suppose would be the price of Tennessee bonds in the market?

Mr. President, if it is necessary to protect the credit of a State how much greater and more important is it that we should guard and protect the credit of the United States? If the credit of a State is above the credit of the United States, then we may expect the securities of that State to take precedence of the securities of the United States and drive them from the market. It is necessary for us to maintain, above everything else, the credit of this nation. If we are to have another rebellion, as we may at some future time, it will be important for us that we guard the nation's credit at this time, looking forward to the future in the expectation that we may call for loans hereafter. Unless we do this what guarantee have we for the future of the success of our arms? I apprehend if it was not the expectation of those who invested in the United States bonds that they should receive their money in gold in the future this rebellion would never have been put down; your Union would have been scattered to the winds, and each State would be legislating in its own behalf at this time, and you would be in a state of anarchy equalled only by that of Mexico.

Such a proposition, emanating from the President of the United States, has a tendency to depreciate the credit of the United States and to destroy the future prospect of obtaining money in case of need. It has a tendency to relieve those people who were enemies to the Government in time of war from taxes, and it appeals to the prejudice of that class of people who were opposed to the war for the suppression of the rebellion to join with him in repudiating this debt, that we may lose the benefits which we have derived in maintaining the Union. Sir, if we do not maintain the credit of this nation our efforts have been in vain; the efforts of those gallant young men who went forth to battle and sacrificed their lives on the altar of our country have been in vain. What would they say if they could rise up before you to-day? They would ask you if you were going to repudiate the debt which was contracted to feed them, to clothe them, and to support them in their efforts to maintain this Union. They would say, "Are you going to be so picayunish now as to repudiate the debt contracted in the glorious cause for which we laid down our lives and now lie in our blood-bought graves? Will you dishonor the nation by repudiating that debt, and declaring that you will not pay your portion of the taxes, when we have given our blood and our lives to support the nation?"

Sir, when I think of these things, when I think of the young men who have died in defense of the nation, when I think of their heroism, their fortitude, their sickness, and their wasting away in the rebel pens that I visited in the South; when I think of those pens with the little holes they dug in the earth where many of them died—for I counted three or four thousand graves of men whose deaths were caused by starvation by the enemies of this Government—and then when I see this same interest at work to repudiate the debt of the Government, and I see this same desire to dishonor the Government and to make it inefficient in every way possible, this to me is the greatest crime of all. The Executive of the nation deliberately proposes here at this juncture, when we have achieved our victory and glory has crowned our arms and these men are enshrined in the hearts of their country, to repudiate the debt due to those loyal men who sold their farms and their property and invested the proceeds in Government securities to support this Government and to support their children and their brethren in this war to put down the rebellion.

Sir, I think it is only necessary to bring this question to a vote. I cannot see how any loyal man can vote otherwise than to censure the President for so monstrous a proposition. I cannot see how any of our Democratic friends on this floor can refuse to join in such a resolution. I trust, sir, that this resolution will be adopted unanimously without any amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. HOWE. Is that amendment open to amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. HOWE. Then I wish to move to amend it. If the Clerk will report it once more, I will tell him where I should like to have the amendment come in.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is to insert after the word "nation," in the second line of the resolution, the following:

And agreeing with the President in the sentiment expressed in his message, "that the national faith should be faithfully observed."

Mr. HOWE. I move to insert after the word "sentiment" the words "which ought to have been, but which was not;" so that if amended it will read:

And agreeing with the President in the sentiment, which ought to have been, but which was not, expressed in his message, that the national faith should be faithfully observed.

[Laughter.]

If the Senate will indulge me one moment I think they will see the importance, if we are going to commit the Senate to a sentiment expressed in the message, of voting the sentiment correctly. It will be seen that the sentiment in the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut differs widely from the sentiment expressed in the message. That amendment reads, that we agree to the sentiment expressed that the "national faith should be sacredly observed." The message says "the national credit." The national faith requires that we should pay what we have agreed to pay; but I have known many a debtor who thought he could best preserve his credit by paying a part of his debt and keeping the balance in his pocket. The President seems to have adopted that view, that the national credit can be best preserved by paying a part of the debt, or paying none of the principal of the debt, but only the interest; and so that we may be left in no doubt as to what he means, he qualifies his statement that the national credit should be preserved by going on to explain how it should be preserved, to wit, by remembering what is due to the great mass of the people and taking good care not to pay any of the principal, but only the interest for a limited number of years.

Mr. DIXON. I intended, of course, to offer the amendment in the exact language of the message, and supposed I had done so. How does it read?

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment, as taken down at the time it was submitted, reads as follows:

And agreeing with the President in the sentiment expressed in his message, "that the national faith should be sacredly observed."

Mr. DIXON. It should be "national credit." Of course I can make that verbal amendment.

Mr. HOWE. I take it, as there is another amendment pending, that amendment is not in order.

Mr. DIXON. The meaning is the same.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator can modify his own amendment.

Mr. DIXON. I ask leave to make that verbal amendment.

Mr. HOWE. I raise the question of order whether the amendment now moved by the Senator from Connecticut is in order while another amendment to the amendment is pending.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As a general principle, the mover of an amendment may modify his own amendment. Whether he can do it after an amendment to that is offered is a new question to me; but, I suppose, a liberal interpretation would permit him to do it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I think there is a very easy mode of getting out of the difficulty in which we are in reference to this resolution; and that mode I suggest to be for the Senate to pass a resolution that the President had no legal right to express any such opinion as he has stated in his message; so that the House of Representatives may draw up articles of impeachment and send him here for some two months' trial. It will give us very healthy and profitable exercise during the cold winter months, and will be only following the illustrious example heretofore set!

Mr. CATTELL. I will say, in answer to the gentleman from Delaware, that I presume the President had a right to say what he did to Congress, and the Senate have a perfect right to say they do not approve it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin to the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut.

The question being put, there were, on a division—ayes 18, noes 8; no quorum voting.

Mr. ANTHONY. There is a quorum present. I hope the Chair will put the question over again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Those in the affirmative will rise, and let every one rise that intends to vote.

Twenty-eight Senators rose.

Mr. DIXON. If it is not too late I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What is the question of order?

Mr. DIXON. This amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin is an amendment to an amendment to an amendment.

Mr. POMEROY. I submit that a question of order cannot be raised while we are dividing.

Mr. DIXON. My amendment was an amendment to an amendment, and his is an amendment in the third degree.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No; it is not. The amendment of the Senator from Connecticut was to the original proposition reported by the Senator from New Jersey. Those in the negative will rise.

Twelve Senators rose.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the original resolution.

Mr. WHYTE. Reluctant as I am, Mr. President, at this late hour of the day to trespass for a moment—and it shall be but for a moment—upon the time of the Senate, I do not wish the vote which I shall give upon the resolution now pending to be misunderstood either here or by the people whom I have the honor, in part, to represent on this floor.

The resolution as it now stands is, in my judgment, one of censure and of condemnation of the opinion of the President; and as I hold the right of opinion sacred, whether from citizens in public office or in private station, I cannot give any support to the resolution now before this body.

These views of the President have been denounced here as inculcating the doctrine of repudiation. I do not so understand them. Repudiation, as I comprehend it, means the application of the sponge to the national debt. It means rejection of the debt in toto, principal and interest. When Congress, in its fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, demanded of the rebel States prior to their restoration to practical relations with the Federal Government, that they should declare null and void every State obligation, either to pay for arms or for money used in the rebellion or as compensation for slaves emancipated, that I understand to be repudiation. But when the President or any other person undertakes to discuss the means by which the country can be relieved of its pressing obligations, that I conceive to be another and a different thing. And looking at the vast increase of our public debt and the diminution of the revenue, many high-toned and honorable public men have proposed various methods for composition with the public creditors of the United States. The letter of the contract calls for six per cent. in gold as interest; and whenever you depart from that and offer to the creditors a less rate of interest, you might as well call it repudiation as so to stigmatize the opinions of the President.

When, at the last session of Congress, the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Finance offered his proposition to consolidate the public debt and reduce the interest, which was followed by propositions from other Senators and members of the other House to reduce it still lower, no hands were raised in holy horror, nor was there any cry of "repudiation" then. Now the proposition of the President is the same in principle; the difference is in degree. One proposes the payment of the principal at a long time with a less rate of interest. The President proposes the extinction of the principal by paying the existing rate of interest for a longer period of years. I see no difference, therefore, Mr. President; and while I do not concur in the views of the President of the United States, while they have no indorsement of mine, I cannot vote for a resolution of this kind. I come from a State which has passed through crucial trials in the payment of its public debt and has come out unscathed and untarnished by the abatement of a single dollar that it owed. Therefore, I concur in no proposition to repudiate the public debt or to abate it; but I shall no more enter into a clamor against the President of the United States because he entertains sentiments different from me than I would join here in a crusade against any Senator who might propose the payment of the debt of the United States by the retirement of the old issues and the furnishing of a new issue payable at a longer period and with a smaller amount of interest.

Mr. VICKERS. Mr. President, I do not desire to detain the Senate, but to express briefly the views which explain the vote I shall give. I agree with the Senator from my own State who has just spoken, and adopt the views he entertains. I have several other objections, however, to the passage of this resolution, which I will endeavor to explain.

The Executive is a coördinate department of the Government, and it is his constitutional duty—a duty which he cannot avoid—to make known his views upon the condition of the country and its finances. The very theory and genius of our Government and the practice which has grown up under it allow great liberty and even license in oral discussions, and in communications in writing with reference to subjects of a political and financial nature. I do not understand the President to recommend repudiation. I do not understand, in the language of this resolution, that his message contains a proposition and a sentiment as it is called; for it proposes to disagree to the proposition and the sentiments expressed by the President. I have looked in vain for any proposition in the message in reference to the subject under consideration. I see no language of recommendation. I do not agree with the Senator from Oregon and the Senator from Michigan that here is a direct or even an implied proposition to pay less than the principal and the interest of the public debt. The President knew as well as any one how to make a proposition, and when he designed to make one he did not fail to use language to do so. For example, on page 28 of his message he says:

"I renew the recommendation contained in my communication to Congress dated the 18th of July last—a copy of which accompanies this message—that the judgment of the people should be taken on the propriety of so amending the Federal Constitution that it shall provide," &c.

Here is a direct recommendation of the President; but there is no recommendation, either express or implied, in the passage which is contained in the resolution under discussion, and there is no proposition in it. If there is no proposition it is only, then, the sentiment of the President; and is the Senate of the United States called upon to be sentimental? I consider this resolution a mere abstraction; and shall we legislate upon abstractions? Let us rather legislate upon some practical subject.

I ask, if this resolution should pass what would be its effect? Would it enlighten the public mind in reference to the payment of the national debt and its interest? Would it indicate the policy of Congress in reference to the payment of the debt? Is there anything tangible in this resolution, anything which can afford to the people any hope of relief from the heavy burdens of taxation which they are called upon to bear? Is there anything to commend it to the people? Will it indicate to them any mode or measure of relief? The national debt, as was stated yesterday by the honorable Senator from Delaware, amounts to $2,500,000,000; but I hold in my hand an editorial from a paper published in this city, the National Intelligencer, which makes the debt, not the national debt proper, but the debt growing out of the war, much more than that spoken of by the Senator from Delaware. In reading this and the communication referred to in it from a New York paper I will omit all reflections against the Congress of the United States, and also against the Secretary of the Treasury. The article is:

"The true figure as to the national debt is not seen in the present reported amount of it. It will continue to increase largely if all the legitimate demands upon the United States Treasury are answered. Considered prospectively, the debt of the General Government cannot be put at a dollar less than $3,000,000,000. As things are, gold interest on that sum will amount, in the sort of money that the people are now using, to something like $270,000,000. But State, city, county, and town debts are in reality, for the most part, of the debt incurred on civil war account. These are not less than $2,000,000,000. Thus the aggregate of the debt caused by the civil war is $5,000,000,000. This was doubtless the sum which Mr. Thaddeus Stevens so often referred to as the true national debt by reason of the war. States, cities, and towns could not have entered upon any such usurious and unconscionable contracts as to pay excessive interest in gold. Estimating the aggregate amount of interest in greenbacks at $120,000,000 on the $2,000,000,000 in State, city, town, and county obligations on account of the war, the total amount of interest to be paid by the people yearly in greenbacks will be nearly four hundred million dollars.

"The people cannot possibly pay this amount even in lawful currency without much suffering, and at the same time defray the annual expenses for carrying on governments in the form of national, State, county, and town. Elsewhere will be found, among extracts from the newspaper press, one from the Philadelphia North American, (Radical,) which asserts that the view of the President on the subject of the public debt must be regarded. The New York Herald speaks as follows upon this subject:

"Mr. Johnson's remarks about the necessity of extinguishing the debt, and that the bondholders have received and are receiving an enormous amount over, and above what was given for the bonds, are true enough. No people were ever fleeced as the people of this country have been by the shameful manner in which the debt was created."

"The debt ought not and need not have been more than a third of what it is."

"Still the public may be oppressed beyond the limit of forbearance. The bondholders, Shylock-like, may demand the pound of flesh, may clamor for exorbitant immunities while all the rest of the community are suffering, till the people are driven to look into the equity of their claims and resort to repudiation. This, let it be remembered, would be no new thing in the history of nations. Indeed, it is hardly possible to point to any nation that has not in some form or other entirely or partially repudiated its debt. Even England, which is held up as the paragon of honor, reduced the interest on its debt from time to time from six per cent. or more to three and a half and three per cent. The interest drawn now by our bondholders, as the President remarks, is enormous. Reckoning the difference between gold and currency and the immunity from taxation the amount of interest is about ten per cent. But the national banks make considerably more than this on their bonds—that is, from fifteen to seventeen per cent.—through the privileges given to them by Congress. There is no denying the fact that this is an infamous state of things, contrary to a just equality of privileges and burdens in the community, and very oppressive to the industrious classes."

"How, then, are these first mutterings of repudiation to be checked? How are we to pay the debt equitably and honorably and avoid repudiation? Not by the exacting demands of the bondholders to be paid the uttermost cent in specie, according to their interpretation of the letter or spirit of the bond, while all other debts and everybody else are paid in depreciated currency. Not by their demands to be relieved of a fair share of the public burdens. No; the public creditors must share these burdens with the people, and the interest of the debt must be reduced. The interest is now far too high, and out of all proportion to either what was given for the debt or the value of the capital. Laws are passed in all countries against usurious interest as one of the greatest evils to society; yet that our debt is most exorbitant. In a word, it is far too oppressive and corrupting and dangerous in its influence. Two things are necessary, then, to relieve the country from its heavy burdens, and possibly from repudiation, namely, the funding of the debt at a low rate of interest, and the certain and steady liquidation of the principal."

The view of the President, as I understand it, is practically illustrated as follows:

The United States in account with A. B.

Dr.
1863. To cash paid for one bond of $100, say in gold.....	$30 00
To interest for twenty-one years.....	63 00
	<hr/> $113 00

Cr.
1868. By interest for five years, from 1863 to 1868, in gold, upon $100.....	$30 00
By interest for sixteen years, proposed to be paid.....	96 00
	<hr/> $126 00

Being thirteen dollars actually paid above the value in coin given for the bonds; and if you calculate the interest of $100 at nine per cent. for twenty-one years you will have an over payment of the bond at the end of that time of seventy-six dollars. This is a practical application of the principle which the President has suggested in his message, for I have considered it merely as a suggestion for the consideration of Congress and not as a proposed measure.

I prefer greatly to pay the debt, both principal and interest; I prefer to pay it all in coin; and I would prefer if it were funded to pay it at a particular period with six per cent. interest. I desire that no creditor shall receive anything less than the principal and interest. But this is a practical question, and the inquiry must come home to every Senator how is this debt to be paid? There is not specie enough in the country to pay it, and according to the estimate which I have read from the National Intelligencer the debt of the General Government and the debt of the cities and the towns growing out of the war amounts to five billion dollars. Where will you get the specie necessary to pay this debt? Five billions is estimated by some to be the debt; and the Senator from Delaware told us yesterday that there were but four billions of coin in the world. How is it to be paid? Resolutions will not pay it. This resolution and its kindred resolutions now lying on the table and ready to be discussed will not provide a means or a remedy for the payment of this debt.

I know not why we should be so sensitive upon this subject when a mere suggestion is made for our consideration. I do not think that we have a right; properly considering the comity that should exist between the different branches of the Government, to pass, either directly or impliedly, a vote of censure upon the Executive simply because he submits to us a proposition for our consideration, a suggestion merely. Why, sir, if the President had recommended to us that the debt should be funded at a less rate of interest there would have been no proposition to pass a vote of censure upon him; but, as was so eloquently stated by the Senator from Delaware yesterday, the principle is the same; it is paying less than you contracted to pay. When the Government borrowed this money it agreed to pay interest at six per cent. in coin. If that is a part of the contract how can the Government evade the payment of six per cent. in coin upon the national debt? If it funds the debt and pays only four or four and a half or five per cent., does that fulfill the letter or the spirit of the contract? It does not. Then it impairs the obligation of the contract. How, then, can it be said that one mode is to be called repudiation and another mode which does not fulfill the contract is to be called an honorable mode?

Why, sir, I do not consider that in any of these propositions there is anything like dishonor or anything like bad faith intended; but these are propositions which are submitted to the consideration of the representatives of the people and of the States.

Now, what is the legislation of Congress on this subject—I do not mean upon the subject of the public debt, but on the subject of repudiation? I propose to read from a portion of the report of Mr. Spinner, the Treasurer of the United States, who speaks very plainly: Speaking of the refusal of the Government to receive fractional currency above a certain amount to pay the debts which postmasters owe to the Government, he says:

"Officers engaged in Government collections, especially those connected with the Post Office Department, suffer in consequence. Postmasters are by law compelled to receive these Government tokens in payment for postage stamps, and are then immediately liable to the Government for the amounts of such sales in good money. But the Government that sold these tokens at par for their face value or paid them as money to its creditors now turns round and refuses to receive them back in payment from its own officers, who were by law compelled to receive them on account of the Government. Postmasters who were so obliged to receive these tokens have offered them by the bagful in payment of their post office receipts at the counter of the Treasury and have been compelled to carry them home again, because the Treasury cannot receive over sixty cents in three-cent pieces, nor over four cents in one or two-cent pieces in any one payment. Was there ever an act of the Government of a respectable people that, for meanness, can compare with this? An individual that would practice such a confidence game would be branded as a two-penny thief, and would soon be consigned to a house of correction. A Government that practices such frauds upon the people cannot hope long to retain the respect of anybody. It has been intimated, and there are those that are uncharitable enough to believe the story, that the ownership of an unprofitable nickel mine had something to do in influencing the passage of these 'speedy-return-to-specie-payment' laws."

"A Government that has the meanness to openly repudiate the payment or redemption of its one and two cent issues will soon be suspected of being none too good to repudiate payment of the larger obligations of the nation. He that is not faithful in small things will scarcely be trusted in large ones. Congress can prevent this danger and save the reputation of the Government only by making immediate provision for the prompt redemption of these, its smallest, obligations in lawful money."

That is the language of the Treasurer of the United States, in which he charges direct repudiation upon the legislation of Congress; but I am confident that it never was the intention of Congress to repudiate in any improper sense. It only shows the different constructions placed upon this word "repudiation." I do not believe that the President of the United States ever designed to intimate anything that was unfair or dishonorable. It was only a suggestion, which, of course, must receive the sanction of the creditors before it can be effective, whether they should be paid in sixteen years, gold interest, or whether they shall run the hazard which everybody seems to have some apprehension of, that this debt never will be fully paid. I wish it were in the power of this Government to-day to pay every dollar of the debt, principal and interest, in coin. I do not indorse this recommendation of the President; but I have looked upon it with that respectful consideration with which I always regard state papers that emanate from those in high authority. He occupies a very eminent position. He has opportunities and advantages for ascertaining the true condition of the country in all its interests and in all its financial affairs, in its productions, in its various interests, and looking at things from a stand-point so different from that which I am enabled to occupy, I must have some respect for views which emanate from a man so distinguished as he is, and occupying with such advantages as he does his high and elevated position.

Who can believe for a moment that the President, in his suggestion of another among the many modes devised for the payment of the public debt, meant anything like dishonorable repudiation? He has acquired a reputation for singleness of purpose and integrity of which he may well be proud and jealous. What motive could he have, as President of a great people, to advocate repudiation? He has been educated in the school of adversity in moral and political principles that have commanded the highest respect.

Mr. WARNER. I should like to ask the Senator from Maryland a question. The President, in his message, proposes that the Government should never pay the bondholder a dollar, either of interest or principal. If this is not repudiation, what is?

Mr. VICKERS. I thought the proposition was to pay the interest for sixteen years. If the Senator has read the message as I have certainly he must have seen that the President does not propose to repudiate the payment of interest.

Mr. WARNER. I ask the Senator if the President proposes ever to pay the bondholder a single dollar of money? I ask if a single dollar of money under the President's proposition is ever to go out of the Treasury to the bondholder?

Mr. VICKERS. If the Senator from Alabama had listened attentively to the account which I stated between the bondholder and the Government he would have perceived that when the bondholder paid but fifty dollars for a Government bond of $100, if he received interest on $100 for twenty-one years, according to the President's proposition, he would be paid both principal and interest on the fifty dollars which he loaned at six per cent., and be overpaid by thirteen dollars, and overpaid by seventy-six dollars if the interest be computed at nine per cent., which the President has stated it to be in his message. That, I say, is the President's view, that the payment of interest at six per cent. in gold on the nominal amount of the bond will pay both principal and interest on the actual amount which was loaned by the creditor. That is my view of the President's position.

Mr. WARNER. That does not answer my question. Does not the Senator understand that the President proposes that the Government shall never pay the bondholder any money out of the Treasury? Is not that the proposition of the President?

Mr. VICKERS. The President's suggestion is to pay him the interest for sixteen years and eight months.

Mr. WARNER. Does he propose ever to pay the bondholder any money?

Mr. VICKERS. He proposes to pay him interest on $100, double the sum which he loaned to the Government, for sixteen years and eight months. He does not propose to pay the principal, because, as he states, the payment of this interest on double the actual amount loaned will pay both principal and interest of what the creditor loaned.

Mr. WARNER. Will the Senator answer my question? Under the President's plan will the bondholder ever receive a dollar of money out of the United States Treasury?

Mr. VICKERS. He receives every six months the interest in gold at six per cent. on double the amount of the money he loaned. That is what I understand as the President's view of the subject in the message.

Mr. WARNER. Is that a payment to the bondholder?

Mr. VICKERS. Certainly. Who else can it be paid to? The Government owes the bondholder. The Government gives him a bond for $100 where the bondholder only paid the Government fifty dollars; and then the bondholder every six months gets interest in gold, which is worth nearly nine per cent. a year, not upon the fifty dollars, but upon the $100; and if the calculation is made as I have made it here, it will be seen that when you reduce to practical operation the President's view it will have paid and more than paid both principal and interest of the money actually loaned. But it is not the mode in which I desire to see the bondholder paid.

But, sir, I was going on to say that the President has been educated in the school of adversity, in moral and political principles that have commanded the highest respect. No one could have gone through the alphabet of office, grading from the lowest to the greatest by qualifications and merit, and taken the first honor in the highest political school of his country among thousands of competitors, unless he had the will, the capacity, and the experience of a statesman as well as the moral and intellectual stamina of a man of honor and ability. Like all public men he may have committed official errors; but I have yet to hear of a suspicion of his personal integrity. In some respects he has disappointed the views and expectations of both political parties; but this only vindicates his independence and firmness. It is not contended that he is infallible, but it is assumed that he is incorruptible and patriotic. No President has had to breast the storms of difficulty, of embarrassment, and of I will not say persecution, that has attended his administration. He is the only one who has not had a party to sustain him. He has passed through a fiery ordeal unparalleled in the history of his country; and the recorded verdict of the American Senate, by the votes of those who differed politically from him, but whose high sense of judicial duty induced them to vote his acquittal, will go down to posterity crowned with immortal honor. I mean no reflection or disrespect, even by implication, upon those who differed with them upon that occasion; but the magistrate who has thus been in peril is not the one to tarnish his own fame or the bright escutcheon of the nation's faith.

I move, sir, to amend the resolution now pending by adding to it:

But we do not condemn the sentiments of the President's message contained in the following words:

The anomalous condition of our currency is in striking contrast with that which was originally designed. Our circulation now embraces, first, notes of the national banks, which are made receivable for all dues to the Government, excluding imposts, and by all its creditors, excepting in payment of interest upon its bonds and the securities themselves; second, legal-tender notes, issued by the United States, and which the law requires shall be received as well in payment of all debts between citizens as of all Government dues, excepting imposts; and third, gold and silver coin. By the operation of our present system of finance, however, the metallic currency, when collected, is reserved only for one class of Government creditors, who, holding its bonds, semi-annually receive their interest in coin from the national Treasury. There is no reason which will be accepted as satisfactory by the people why those who defend us on the land and protect us on the sea; the pensioner upon the gratitude of the nation, bearing the scars and wounds received while in its service; the public servants in the various departments of the Government; the farmer who supplies the soldiers of the Army and the sailors of the Navy; the artisan who toils in the nation's workshops, or the mechanics and laborers who build its edifices and construct its forts and vessels of war, should, in payment of their just and hard-earned dues, receive depreciated paper, while another class of their countrymen, no more deserving, are paid in coin of gold and silver. Equal and exact justice requires that all the creditors of the Government should be paid in a currency possessing a uniform value. This can only be accomplished by the restoration of the currency to the standard established by the Constitution; and by this means we would remove a discrimination which may, if it has not already done so, create a prejudice that may become deep-rooted and wide-spread, and imperil the national credit."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. VICKERS. I now offer this amendment. To add to the resolution:

But we approve that portion of the said message which is contained in the following words:

It is unreasonable to expect a return to a sound currency so long as the Government and banks, by continuing to issue irredeemable notes, fill the channels of circulation with depreciated paper. Notwithstanding a coinage by our mints, since 1849, of $874,000,000, the people are now strangers to the currency which was designed for their use and benefit, and specimens of the precious metals bearing the national device are seldom seen, except when produced to gratify the interest excited by their novelty. If depreciated paper is to be continued as the permanent currency of the country, and all our coin is to become a mere article of traffic and speculation, to the enhancement in price of all that is indispensable to the comfort of the people, it would be wise economy to abolish our mints, thus saving the nation the care and expense incident to such establishments, and let all our precious metals be exported in bullion. The time has come, however, when the Government and national banks should be required to take the most efficient steps and make all necessary arrangements for a resumption of specie payments. Let specie payments once be earnestly inaugurated by the Government and banks, and the value of the paper circulation would directly approximate a specie standard."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CATTELL. I rise to say that I am dying to make a speech on this subject. It has not, I apprehend, been sufficiently discussed; but still, having some regard for the comfort of members and the approach of the dinner hour, I do not propose to say a word except to call for the yeas and nays on the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 43, nays 6; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Anthony, Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Corbett, Cragin, Dixon, Edmunds, Ferry, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Kellogg, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Nye, Osborn, Pomerooy, Ramsey, Rice, Robertson, Ross, Sawyer, Sherman, Spencer, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Van Winkle, Wade, Warner, Willey, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—43.

NAYS—Messrs. Davis, McCreery, Patterson of Tennessee, Saulsbury, Vickers, and Whyte—6.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Buckalew, Conness, Doolittle, Drake, Fowler, Hendricks, McDonald, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Norton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pool, Sprague, Tipton, Trumbull, and Welch—17.

So the resolution was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, communicating a report of the Secretary of State, in answer to the resolution of the Senate of the 8th instant, calling for information concerning recent transactions in the region of the La Plata affecting the political relations of the United States with Paraguay, the Argentine republic, Uruguay, and Brazil.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that those papers be laid on the table, and printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That seems to be a large document.

Mr. SUMNER. I know it is a large document; but then the call was made expressly to obtain the information.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator from Massachusetts has examined the papers and thinks it necessary to print them, I have nothing to say.

Mr. SUMNER. I have looked at them sufficiently to say that it is difficult for any one, or at least for myself, to make discrimination among the papers. It is a consecutive series, historical in its nature, relating to events which have occupied so much attention in the papers lately.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 86, which it was the understanding yesterday should be taken up.

Mr. HOWE. I must object to that if the motion is to be pressed now. I wish to say to the Senate that several days ago a little claim was taken up for consideration by the Senate and is still the pending order; it having been laid aside informally, and it is of great importance to the Committee on Claims that the principles involved in that bill should be settled. We have other claims pending involving the same principle. If the law is settled, as it is insisted by some it ought to be, we can dispose of a great deal of business on the Calendar. Unless the Senate will settle that principle we must entertain these cases and we must investigate them, and we have not time to do any fancy work. The time of the Senate necessary to settle this question must be expended at some period, and I think can be as well expended now as at any later day in the session; and I think it is the right of the Committee on Claims that that question shall be settled one way or the other, and I must object to that particular bill being displaced at the present time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The resolution to which I refer has been before this body for thirteen months. It is not any fancy business. It proposes a distinct proposition of obligation. It is of great importance to the public to say, as a matter of fact and as a matter of honor, one way or the other; I do not propose now to discuss its merits. I gave notice some days ago of an intention to call it up in the present condition of affairs. It was stated yesterday or the day before without any gentleman objecting, when the honorable Senator from Kentucky was moving an amendment to the resolution that has just passed, that this resolution was to come up afterward. Now, I am perfectly willing to assist my friend from Wisconsin to settle the question of Sue Murphey to-morrow morning in the morning hour, but as this joint resolution has been so long before the body and is of such importance I think it should be taken up now. The bill to which my friend refers has lost its place by going over a day, it having been laid aside.

Mr. CONKLING. At what time does the Senator wish to consider this joint resolution?

Mr. EDMUNDS. At any time; as soon as it can be reached.

Mr. CONKLING. Before the holidays?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I want to consider it whenever I can get the Senate to take it up.

Mr. HENDERSON. Before any motion is put on that subject I desire to state to the Senate that the Senator who is chairman of the Finance Committee has just left the Hall, supposing that no business would be called up this morning.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That Senator was informed yesterday, and apparently acquiesced in what was agreed by general consent, that this joint resolution should come up to-day, and it would be very strange if after such acquiescence the Senate should refuse to carry out the arrangement.

Mr. HENDERSON. I merely stated what the Senator from Ohio said on leaving, that he supposed no business would be called up at this late hour.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I wish to say, in reply to my friend, the Senator from Vermont, that if his resolution has been pending for thirteen months I think it pretty conclusive evidence of one of two things: either that the passage of that resolution at any particular time is not of any great importance to the country, or that the Senate has been very derelict in its duty. The Senator does not state any reason why it cannot just as well be disposed of after the holidays as before. I do state a reason which I think ought to influence the votes of Senators why the question involved in this small claim should be settled by the Senate, and settled at an early day. You seem to think it important enough to have a Committee on Claims. The business before that committee is pressing. If this question is settled one way it will be relieved of considerable of that business; and I ask in the name of right and justice, as well as in the name of convenience to the committee, that you will settle that question.

Mr. CAMERON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask the Senator to withdraw the motion, to allow me to offer a resolution to which I think nobody will object.

Mr. CAMERON. Very well.

AMERICAN CITIZENS IN JAPAN.

Mr. CONKLING. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to communicate to the Senate, if not incompatible with the public interest, any information in his possession concerning the exercise or claim by consuls of the United States in Japan of judicial power in cases arising between American citizens and citizens or subjects of any foreign nation other than Japan; and if so, under what authority of law or treaty said powers were exercised or claimed; also, to state what further legislation, if any, is necessary for the better adjudication and protection of the rights of person and property of Americans in Japan.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. POMEROY. I have no objection to the resolution, but it is almost uniformly the practice of the Senate to address such resolutions to the President. He is to judge whether the public interests will allow the information to be communicated.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg pardon. This is simply a call for information from the State Department.

Mr. POMEROY. But in such cases we address the President, and he sends the resolution to the Secretary of State, and the President sends us his answer. We do not communicate with the Secretary of State. Such has been the practice of the Senate, although I believe there are one or two precedents to the contrary.

Mr. CONKLING. There can be no difficulty in this case; it is a mere call for information.

Mr. POMEROY. Who is to judge whether furnishing it is compatible with the public interest? The Secretary of State?

Mr. CONKLING. Do we not use that form continually in regard to Cabinet officers?

Mr. POMEROY. No; only when we send resolutions to the President.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg the Senator's pardon. The difference is this: when we send to the President we request him; when we send to a Cabinet officer we direct him. That is one thing I have learned pretty thoroughly in my experience. We request the President; we direct the Cabinet ministers. This is a mere call for information, and therefore there cannot be any importance in the question raised.

Mr. POMEROY. If it is a mere call for information why put in the phrase allowing the Secretary to judge whether it is for the public interest to communicate it?

Mr. CONKLING. Does the Senator mean to say that we do not address calls for information to Cabinet officers and leave them to judge whether it is compatible with the public interest or not?

Mr. POMEROY. I do not mean to say so.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I mean to say that during the brief time I have been in this body, in more than one hundred instances the contrary is true.

Several Senators. Oh, no.

Mr. CONKLING. Most certainly.

Mr. POMEROY. I have not the slightest objection to this call, but I simply say that the resolution is against the precedents of the Senate.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I think it is manifestly improper to send a resolution to the Secretary of State, and leave it to his discretion judging of our foreign affairs. That has never been done.

Mr. CONKLING. How would Senators like to have this? Would they have it left to the President?

Mr. BUCKALEW. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. Very well. Suppose we change it by consent, and strike out "Secretary of State" and insert "President."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be so modified.

Mr. CONKLING. Is it satisfactory now?

Mr. POMEROY. Entirely.

Mr. CONKLING. Now, it being satisfactory to everybody else, I ask to have it changed to the usual form, that the President be "requested," because we never direct him. We request him. He is one of the branches of the Government. Let that change be made, also.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be so modified.

The resolution, as modified, was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate, if not incompatible with the public interest, any information in his possession concerning the exercise or claim by consuls of the United States in Japan of judicial powers in cases arising between American citizens and citizens or subjects of any foreign nation other than Japan, and if so under what authority of law or treaty said powers were exercised or claimed; also, to state what further legislation, if any, is necessary for the better adjudication and protection of the rights of person and property of Americans in Japan.

Mr. CAMERON. I renew my motion that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us have a vote on my motion to take up Senate joint resolution No. 66.

Mr. CAMERON. I withdraw my motion for that purpose.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I desire to say a word if that resolution is to be pressed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on taking up the resolution indicated by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. BUCKALEW. That is the very thing I am opposed to.

Mr. CAMERON. Then I do not withdraw my motion to adjourn.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Now, sir, within a couple of days of a recess to take up an abstract proposition simply declaring the Senate's opinion, having nothing practical in it, would be a manifest waste of the public time.

Mr. CAMERON. I wish my colleague would give way to a motion to adjourn.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I give way.

Mr. CAMERON. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On that question, if we have got to have this species of opposition after a fair understanding yesterday, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, December 17, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock m.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution (H. R. No. 375) donating condemned cannon for the erection of a monument to Major General Kearny; when the Speaker signed the same.

DEATH OF HON. THADDEUS STEVENS.

Mr. DICKEY. Mr. Speaker, the painful duty has devolved upon me of announcing to this House the death of my predecessor, Hon. THADDEUS STEVENS, of Pennsylvania.

This distinguished statesman was not merely my predecessor in this body, but in my childhood my father taught me to admire and love him who was the instructor and guide of my youth and the friend of my maturer years. If an intimacy with wise and noble men be one of the greatest blessings that can crown a man, then in no part of my career have I been so fortunate as in my association with THADDEUS STEVENS. It was in his office, and in connection with him, that I commenced my professional life; and from that moment, through the turmoil of many legal and political contests, down to the moment when in his last will he selected me to perform the last service one man can ask from his fellow, our friendship suffered neither diminution nor interruption.

Informed that my duty requires of me a sketch of the history of my friend, I hope to be pardoned by the House for any prolixity of statement, promising to leave to others abler and fitter, his associates here who are to follow me, the analysis of his character as a statesman and the story of his struggles and triumphs in this arena, where he was recognized as a great leader and bore the name of "the old Commoner."

THADDEUS STEVENS was born at Danville, Caledonia county, Vermont, on the 4th day of April, 1792, and died at his residence in this city at midnight on the 11th day of August, 1868. His parents were poor in a community where poverty was the rule and wealth the exception. Of his father I know but little, save that he enlisted in the war of 1812 and died in service. Upon his mother chiefly fell the burden of rearing their four sons. She was a woman of great energy, strong will, and deep piety. Early seeing the ambition and fully sympathizing with the aspirations of her crippled boy, she devotedly seconded his efforts for the acquisition of knowledge, and by her industry, energy, and frugality largely aided him in procuring a collegiate education. He returned her affection with the full strength of his strong nature, and for many years after he had acquired fame and fortune in his adopted State had the pleasure of making an annual pilgrimage to the home which he had provided for her comfort, and where she dispensed, with means he furnished, a liberal charity.

In the last year of his life, in writing his will with his own hand, while making no provision for the care of his own grave, he did not forget that of his mother, but set apart an ample sum for that purpose, directing yearly payments upon the condition "that the sexton keep the grave in good order, and plant roses and other cheerful flowers at each of the four corners of said grave every spring." In the same instrument, in devising $1,000 in aid of the establishment at his home of a Baptist church, of which society his mother was an earnest member, he says:

"I do this out of respect to the memory of my mother, to whom I owe whatever little of prosperity I have had on earth, which, small as it is, I desire emphatically to acknowledge."

After attending the common schools of the neighborhood he fitted for college at the Peacham Academy, in his native county, entered the University of Vermont, and remained there about two years. The college suspending operations on account of the war, he proceeded to Dartmouth, and graduated at that institution in 1814. After reading law at Peacham in the office of Judge Mattocks, for some months, he left his native State and settled in Pennsylvania in 1815, first in the town of York, where he taught an academy and pursued his legal studies. The rules of court in that district having required students to read one year in the office of an attorney, he went to Belair, Harford county, Maryland, and was there examined and admitted to practice in August, 1816. He at once returned to Pennsylvania, and opened a law office at Gettysburg, in the county of Adams, and entered upon the practice of his profession in that and adjoining counties. He was soon in the possession of an extensive and lucrative business, to which he gave his entire attention for some sixteen years. I may here be allowed briefly to allude to a few traits of Mr. STEVENS as a lawyer. Although not perhaps of great national reputation as such, he was recognized by the profession in a State claiming some eminence for the high character of her advocates and jurists as one of her greatest lawyers, and was so pronounced by three of her ablest chief justices, Gibson, Black, and Lewis, who tried him by the sure test of uniform power.

I need scarcely say that Mr. STEVENS shone at the bar with the same clearness of statement, force and eloquence of expression, power of argumentation, wit, sarcasm, and invective, which he employed in legislative halls, and that there, as here, he was master of all the weapons of debate. As an advocate he was always jealous of the rights of his profession, and resisted their innovation. He was always courteous to the court, and uniformly brief, never speaking beyond an hour upon any question. He never took or used notes of the evidence, the speeches of opponents, or the rulings of the court, trusting wholly to a memory that never failed him. In the preparation of his law he was industrious and careful, here, too, relying upon his memory, his brief seldom contained more than the name of the case and page of the book. In argument he cited but few authorities, and those directly to his purpose. Grasping one or two points which he conceived vital to the cause, he directed all his energies and concentrated all his powers upon them, giving little attention to subordinate questions. No matter with whom associated, he never tried a cause save upon his own theory of the case. Ad nisi prius he uniformly insisted on personally seeing and examining, before they were called, the important witnesses on his own side. Generally relying upon the strength and presentation of his own case, he seldom indulged in extended cross-examination of witnesses, though possessing rare ability in that direction. He never consented to be concerned or act as counsel in the prosecution of a capital case, not from opposition to the punishment, but because it was repugnant to his feelings and that service was the duty of public officers. He was as remarkable for his consideration, forbearance, and kindness when opposed by the young, weak, or diffident, as he was for the grim jest, haughty sneer, pointed sarcasm, or fierce invective launched at one who entered the lists and challenged battle with such weapons. He was always willing to give advice and assistance to the young and inexperienced members of the profession, and his large library was ever open for their use. He had many young men read law with him, though he did not care to have students. There were, however, two recommendations which never failed to procure an entrance into his office: ambition to learn, and inability to pay for the privilege.

Mr. STEVENS first engaged actively in politics with the rise of the Anti-Masonic party in 1828-29, which he joined in their opposition to secret societies. He was elected to the popular branch of the Legislature of his State, in 1833, as a representative from the county of Adams, and continued to serve in that body almost without interruption until 1840, during which entire period he was the leader of his party in the Legislature, if not the State. During this service he championed many measures of improvement, among others the common-school system of Pennsylvania, which at a critical moment he saved from overthrow by a speech which he always asserted to have, in his opinion, been the most effective he ever made. By that single effort he established the principle, never since seriously questioned in Pennsylvania, that it is the duty of the State to provide the facilities for education to all the children of the Commonwealth. In behalf of this measure he joined hands with his bitterest personal and political enemies. He highly eulogized, for his course upon this question, the chief of the opposing political party, Governor George Wolf, and denounced with all his power of invective the time-servers of his own party. Himself the child of poverty he plead the cause of the poor, and by the force of his will, intellect, and eloquence broke down the barriers enacted by wealth, caste, and ignorance, and earned a name that will endure as long as a child of Pennsylvania gratefully remembers the blessings conferred by light and knowledge.

In 1837-38 Mr. STEVENS was a member of the convention called to revise the constitution of Pennsylvania, an assemblage which numbered as members many of the strongest men of the State, among whom Mr. STEVENS stood in the front rank. This convention, notwithstanding the able and strenuous opposition of a strong minority, led by Mr. STEVENS, inserted the word "white" as a qualification of suffrage, thus disfranchising a race. On this account he refused to append his name to the completed instrument, and stood alone in such refusal. For the same cause he opposed, but unsuccessfully, the ratification by the people.

In 1842 Mr. STEVENS, finding himself deeply in debt by reason of losses in the iron business, and liabilities incurred for numerous indorsements made for friends, removed to Lancaster county, one of the largest, richest, and most populous counties of the State, and resumed the practice of his profession. His reputation as a lawyer had preceded him, and his income almost at once became the largest at the bar. In a few years he paid his debts, and saved the bulk of his estate. In 1848 and 1850 he was elected to Congress from Lancaster county, when, declining to be a candidate, he returned to his profession until 1858, when he was again elected, and continued to hold the seat without interruption till his death. His course upon this floor has passed into and forms no unimportant part in the history of a mighty people in a great crisis of their existence. But I have promised to leave to others to say what may be proper in illustration of his great achievements in his latter days.

To those here who judged of the personal appearance of the deceased only as they looked on him bearing the burden of years and stricken with disease, though he still stood with eye undimmed and will undaunted, I may say that in his prime he was a man physically well proportioned, muscular and strong, of clear and ruddy complexion, with face and feature of great mobility and under perfect command and control. In his youth and early manhood, notwithstanding his lameness, he entered with zest into almost all of the athletic games and sports of the times. He was an expert swimmer and an excellent horseman. When residing at Gettysburg he followed the chase; kept his hunters and hounds.

On a recent visit to his iron-works I found the old mountain men garrulous with stories of the risks and dangers of the bold rider, as with horse and hound he followed the deer along the slopes and through the gaps of the South mountain.

In private life, among his friends, Mr. STEVENS was ever genial, kind, and considerate. To them he was linked with hooks of steel. For them he would labor and sacrifice without stint, complaint, or regret. In his hours of relaxation there could be no more genial companion. His rare conversational powers, fund of anecdote, brilliant sallies of wit, and wise sayings upon the topic of the hour, made his company much sought, and many of these are the current coin of the circle in which he moved.

Mr. STEVENS was an honest and a truthful man in public and in private life. His word was sacred in letter and spirit, and was never paltered in a double sense. In money matters he was liberal to a fault, and out of his immense professional income he left but a meager estate. In his private charity he was lavish. He was incapable of saying no in the presence of want or misery. His charity, like his political convictions, regarded neither creed, race, nor color. He was a good classical scholar, and was well read in ancient and modern literature, especially on subjects of philosophy and law. In his old age he read but few books. Shakespeare, Dante, Homer, Milton, and the Bible could, however, generally be found upon the table in his sleeping room, where he was accustomed to read in bed. He was simple and temperate in his habits.

He disliked the use of tobacco, and for forty years never used or admitted to his house intoxicating drinks except by direction of his physician.

Mr. STEVENS was deeply loved and fully trusted by his constituents. He was often in advance of their views; sometimes he ran counter to their prejudices or passions; yet such was his popularity with them, so strong their faith in his wisdom, in the integrity of his action and the purity of his purpose, that they never failed to sustain him. Popular with men of all parties, with his own supporters his name was a household word. To them, and among themselves, "Old Thad" was a phrase of endearment; while even his foes spoke of him with pride as the "great Commoner." No man ever died more deeply mourned by a constituency than THADDEUS STEVENS.

Having briefly selected some of the incidents that marked the history of my friend, I will in conclusion say a few words of him on a subject in connection with which he is probably more widely known than any other—slavery. Mr. STEVENS was always an anti-slavery man. From the time he left his native mountains to the moment of his death he was not only anti-slavery in the common acceptance of the term, but a bold, fearless, determined, and uncompromising foe to oppression in any and every form. He was an abolitionist before there was such a party name.

His opposition to American slavery, no matter what his party connection, was never based upon mere questions of expediency or political economy. He always viewed it as a great wrong, at war with the fundamental principles of this and all good government, as a sin in the sight of God and a crime against man. For many years, long before it became popular to do so, he denounced this institution as the great crime of the nation on the stump, at the forum, in party conventions and deliberative assemblies. On this question he was always in advance of his party, his State, and his constituents. Always resident in a border county, he defended the fugitive on all occasions, asserted the right of free speech, and stood between the abolitionist and the mob, often with peril to himself. This was one great cause of his having been so long in a minority, and of his entrance late in life into the councils of the nation; but for this he was fully compensated by living to see the destruction of an institution which he loathed, and by receiving for his reward, and as the crowning glory of his life, the blessings of millions he had so largely aided to make free.

The remains of Mr. STEVENS lie in Lancaster, in a private cemetery established by an old friend, in a lot selected by himself, for reasons stated in the touching and beautiful epitaph prepared by himself for inscription upon his tomb:

"I repose in this quiet and secluded spot, not from any natural preference for solitude, but finding other cemeteries limited by charter rules as to race, I have chosen it that I might be enabled to illustrate in my death the principles which I have advocated through a long life—equality of man before his Creator."

Let us trust and believe that if the earnest and sincere prayers of millions of the poor, downtrodden, and oppressed may smooth the pathway of the traveler on his journey from this world to the bourne of all, his has been a happy exit.

I offer the following resolutions:

Resolved, That this House has heard with deep regret the death of Hon. THADDEUS STEVENS, a member of this House from the State of Pennsylvania.

Resolved, That as a testimony of respect to the memory of this distinguished statesman the officers and members of this House will wear the usual badge of mourning for the space of thirty days.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted to the family of the deceased by the Clerk.

Resolved, That this House, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, do now adjourn.

Mr. POLAND. Mr. Speaker, I rise to second the resolutions offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The town of Danville, where Mr. STEVENS was born, and the town of Peacham, in which he lived until he had completed his education and attained his majority, are both adjacent to the town where I reside, and form a part of the district I have the honor to represent. It seems appropriate that a Representative of Mr. STEVENS's native State and the Representative of his native town and county should perform this duty, but I regret that it has fallen upon one who had so little personal knowledge of him. Mr. STEVENS removed from Vermont to Pennsylvania before my birth, and I became a resident of his native county but a few years since, and after his youthful associates were nearly all gone. I met him once or twice in Vermont when he came to visit his aged mother, but except this I never saw him until I came to the Senate at the beginning of the Thirty-Ninth Congress. Since I became a member of this House his advanced age and broken health prevented his active participation in much of its business, and for a great part of the time his attendance during its sessions. I can, therefore, do little more than express the general estimation of his public character and service entertained by myself in common with the people of his native State. I have learned that the parents of Mr. STEVENS had very small pecuniary ability, and that his education was mainly secured by his own energy and efforts. When he removed to the State of Pennsylvania to begin his career of active manhood he went among strangers, dependent for friends, for success in business, for professional or other advancement, for the means of living even, upon what he might, by force of his own unaided efforts and ability, be able to win. How hardly he struggled, how hardly he fought, how successfully he won friends, professional distinction, political advancement, name and fame, we have been told by his long-time friend and neighbor and successor in this House. His career and his success is another instance of what is so common in this country, but so uncommon in all others, of the attainment of the highest professional and political distinction from the humblest condition by the mere force of personal effort and ability.

Mr. STEVENS was another tribute to our system of free institutions, founded upon the equality of all men—institutions which he loved so well, and exerted himself so faithfully to extend and perpetuate. That Mr. STEVENS was a man of marked ability has ever been conceded, as well by his political opponents as by his political and personal friends. He had indomitable courage, energy of character, and tenacious will, so that when he had once settled upon a course of action he pursued it to the end with an apparent, almost reckless, disregard of the opinions and judgments of other men. His leading and characteristic ambition seemed to be to elevate the masses of his fellow-men. He seemed ever to desire and to labor that all men should have an equal start and a fair chance in the race of life. His early and successful efforts in his adopted State in the cause of popular and general education were an apt and enduring illustration of this great trait of his character. He loved freedom and liberty for himself and for all men as well. He hated every form of tyranny and oppression which clogged and opposed the advancement of men to better conditions, and especially did he abhor and detest that vast oppression which once prevailed in this country and which seemed likely to prevail forever—human slavery. Accordingly, when that institution came to be one of the subjects of political controversy in the country, he was found among its most determined and advanced opponents. It is not saying more than I believe to be just to him, that to his efforts as much as to those of any one man is the country indebted for its final overthrow. When the country had become involved in a civil war of appalling magnitude upon this question of slavery, and the great question of the time was whether the Union or slavery should go down, Mr. STEVENS seemed to rise at once to the magnitude and majesty of the occasion.

His leadership of the Union men and opponents of slavery and its abettors during the period of the war, in the great American Commons, was perhaps as brilliant and successful as the world has ever seen. Though I have no reason to doubt he loved his country, its free institutions, and its government as well as others, I have thought his great efforts in their behalf during that period were actuated as much by his hatred of slavery as by his love of country.

I will not further allude to Mr. STEVENS's congressional career, though his public life is mainly included in it, but leave that to others whose opportunities to know it are so much better than my own. Mr. STEVENS had very warm sympathies and great kindness of heart. No case of suffering or distress ever appealed to him in vain; his heart and his hand were always open to sympathize with and relieve the needy and the downtrodden of the earth.

I am aware that since the close of the war, in dealing with the subject of the restoration of the revolted States and their people, that Mr. STEVENS has been charged with entertaining malignant and uncharitable feelings, and being influenced by them in his public action. So far as this charge applies to the masses of the people of those States, who might well be regarded as the deluded victims of unwise leaders, I have never seen any evidence of its truth. He did regard the promoters and leaders of the rebellion as great criminals, who ought to be punished as such; he felt a kind of righteous and holy indignation against them, and as if the nation itself was endangered unless justice and judgment were meted out against them. Mr. STEVENS always retained a strong feeling of attachment to his native State, and a very high regard for her people. It was a sufficient passport to his favor that the applicant came from Vermont. So long as his mother lived he made almost annual pilgrimages to the old home upon the Green mountains to see to her comfort and to visit the scenes of his boyhood. I do not think I ever met him since I have been in Washington but he inquired about something or somebody in Vermont, and almost always had some amusing anecdote to relate connected with his early life. His strong filial affection is beautifully shown by the provision in his will for the annual planting of roses and other cheerful flowers at the corners of the graves of his mother and brother; and his attachment to the scenes and memories of his youthful days is equally well exhibited by his bequest to the Juvenile Library Association of the old Peacham Academy, where he received his preparatory education. The people of Vermont felt a just and laudable pride in Mr. STEVENS and in his distinguished public career. They watched his success, as they have many others of her sons who have gone out from her and attained position and fame in other States. In the case of Mr. STEVENS his public course was generally such as commended itself to their own judgment. Sometimes he announced doctrines and advocated measures more extreme than they were prepared to accept, but they ever felt that for him something was to be pardoned to the spirit of liberty.

The people of Vermont always loved to believe that the strong love of freedom and independence for all men exhibited by him, his hatred of all forms of oppression, and his efforts to elevate and benefit the masses, were, to some extent, due to his being born in Vermont. The early history of Vermont was that of a continual struggle against what they deemed to be unlawful and unjust attempts of other States to obtain jurisdiction and exercise governmental power over them. These struggles had ceased, to be sure, prior to the birth of Mr. STEVENS; but the heroes and statesmen who were her leaders in those trying days were still alive, and gave tone and temper to public sentiment and opinion for many years after. We have loved to believe in Vermont that the free and independent opinions inhaled by him in his youth with the free air of our grand mountains in some degree contributed to make him what he was so emphatically, the friend of the oppressed and the foe of the oppressor. Like other men, he had his faults; but he has done so much for the great cause of humanity that this and all future generations in this land have ample cause to bless and revere his memory. To show the estimate in which Mr. STEVENS was held by the people of Vermont I ask to have the Clerk read the following resolutions, which were unanimously adopted by the Vermont Legislature at their recent session.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Mr. Varnum, of Peacham, offered the following joint resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives. That so great a loss to the nation as the death of Hon. THADDEUS STEVENS deserves, and should receive, of the Representatives of the people of his native State in General Assembly convened, a befitting and appropriate recognition.

Resolved. That we mourn and deeply sympathize with those of his adopted State, whom he so faithfully represented in the councils of our nation, and by whom he was so nobly sustained, in this their great bereavement and irreparable loss, of one so firm, so devoted to the interests, the welfare, and the honor of the people.

Resolved. That his patriotism; his devotion to the principles of liberty, justice, and equality; his unswerving fidelity to the trusts of his State and the trusts of the Union, have left an honorable and ineffaceable impression on the pages of history and on the records of a great Republic.

Resolved. That we will remember him as a son of Vermont, and will cherish his memory, and point with pride to his life as an example of patriotism for ourselves and our posterity.

Resolved. That the Governor be requested to transmit a copy of these resolutions to the Governor of Pennsylvania."

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Speaker, my acquaintance with THADDEUS STEVENS began during the administration of Governor Ritner, of Pennsylvania, about the year 1836. He was then a bold and daring leader of his party. Always in advance of public opinion, he constantly antagonized it with a valor and boldness unequalled. Usually political leaders ascertain the current and drift of public sentiment and accommodate themselves to it. Not so with him. He formed his own opinions and acted on his own convictions. Opposition, so far from weakening his resolves, only nerved him for whatever effort was necessary to the accomplishment of his purpose. He created public opinion and molded public sentiment. In this, above all other traits, lay the greatness of THADDEUS STEVENS. He was always ready to defend his views, never shrinking from any service required by his fidelity to duty. The victims overthrown by his power and logic, and impaled by his wit, irony, and sarcasm, are legion. Many of them, like himself, have gone to their reward, others remain, retaining a lively recollection of the old com-moner.

While he was at times terribly severe, and more rarely discourteous, and sometimes in the intensity of political excitement wounded the feelings of his friends, yet at heart he was eminently kind, generous, and forgiving.

The history of his public life is before the world; his name and fame are a part of the possession of the people. While free government endures THADDEUS STEVENS will be remembered with honor, and his services in its maintenance will be recalled with gratitude. But his greatest achievements were undoubtedly his agency in the establishment of the common-school system of Pennsylvania and in the emancipation of four million slaves. Both these great measures would undoubtedly have been adopted in time without him, but both were hastened by his strong and able support.

When a member of the Pennsylvania Legislature, in 1833, he commenced his public advocacy of free schools, many of our industrious, frugal, agricultural population believed that every man should take care of his own family and educate his children or not as seemed to him best.

The idea of taxing one man to pay for schooling the children of another was looked upon by them as an innovation and an injustice. His constituency held a meeting and instructed him to oppose the proposition. He boldly refused, denounced them for their selfishness, carried his measure, and also a majority of his constituents with him. The abolition of slavery is too recent and his action too well known, not only to the people of the United States but of the world, to require any comment of mine. I cannot refrain, however, from saying that in 1850, being a visitor in this city, I obtained through the courtesy of a friend admittance to the floor of the House. Mr. STEVENS was upon the floor at the time, speaking on the evils of slavery. The leading members from the slaveholding States were gathered in front of his desk. As he portrayed the degradation and crime of slavery in such a manner as he only could portray them scowls settled upon their brows, contempt curled their lips, and oaths could be distinctly heard hissing between their teeth. This was in the days when southern gentlemen enforced their arguments with an appeal to the duel, and southern ruffians resorted to the bowie-knife and bludgeon. I felt alarmed for him, but he proceeded unembarrassed by interruptions and apparently unconscious of the mutterings of the storm. As, reaching his climax, he spoke of Virginia, the proud mother of Presidents, become a breeder of slaves for the southern market, the anger of her Representatives could scarcely be restrained; yet he was as cool as if addressing a jury in his county court-house.

This conveniently illustrates the last remark I wish to make, namely, that THADDEUS STEVENS was preëminently a brave man, who would do and dare everything in the vindication of what he believed to be the truth. But, Mr. Speaker, he is gone; peace be to his ashes. Vermont has the honor of his birth, Pennsylvania the more enduring honor of having adopted him as her son; for were not her valleys his home, her temples of justice his shrine, her legislative halls his first political prize, her people his constituents, her interests his study, her progress his delight, her honor his glory, and is not her soil his grave? Let us imitate his virtues and cherish his memory.

Mr. MAYNARD. In the awful presence of death every voice is silent except the voice of sorrow and eulogy. The infirmities of mortality are forgotten, the good alone is remembered; criticism is disarmed; censure loses its power; men instinctively concede, as they expect, this sad immunity to the grave. It is, let us believe, an unconscious prefiguration of the better life to come.

While offering my tribute to the memory of our venerable and deceased associate, the late THADDEUS STEVENS, it is proper that I confine myself to that portion of his life spent in the national Capitol. Others knew him, it may be, as a student, a teacher, a lawyer, a neighbor—knew him in the amenities and benefactions of home. My acquaintance with him was formed here, and here, I may say in this building, was our intercourse. I met him the first time at the assembling of the Thirty-Sixth Congress, in the winter of 1859. It was a period of great political excitement. The struggle had already begun which within less than two years developed into civil war. It was a time to call forth the best efforts of the best men. Members then of different political parties, we naturally, necessarily perhaps, pursued what was felt to be a common purpose by different methods and distinct organizations. The scenes of that Congress are not easily forgotten. The almost daily contests between Lovejoy and Corwin and STEVENS on the one side, and Hinman and Barksdale and Branch on the other, speaking alone of the dead; but settled the issues for the coming years of bloodshed and carnage. Some of us, foreseeing the calamitous time, interposed to stay the strife, praying that if it were possible this cup of sorrow might pass. Visions of desolated homes, of screaming women, famishing children, and old men, the victims of torture; fields laid waste, and all that makes existence lovely perverted—visions frightfully realized—were ever present before us whose people occupied what we knew must be the battle-ground in case of armed conflict. To avert this terrible visitation I need not say we labored with all the earnestness of agonizing natures. The records remain to tell of our labors. I refer to them at this time and in this connection to attest the feeling of confidence we entertained toward Mr. STEVENS. Armed though he was in completest panoply, and ready for every encounter, we all felt that if war should ensue it would not be his generous nature which would strike the first blow. This is not the occasion to dwell upon the remembered incidents of his intercourse with my associates—still speaking alone of the dead—with Gilmer, of North Carolina; Bouigny, of Louisiana; Bristow and Anderson, of Kentucky; and Brabson and Hatton, of my own State. It was not the intercourse of men who expected soon to become enemies. So we separated at the inauguration of Mr. Lincoln full of anxiety, yet not without hope.

When, the next winter, we met again as members of a new Congress all was changed. A million of men were in arms, and the life of the nation hung upon the issue of battles. We were both upon the Committee of Ways and Means, charged, as the House was at that time organized, with the examination of all financial questions, both of revenue and expenditure, and with the preparation of all revenue bills, which, under the Constitution, must originate in this House. The expenditures of the Government, never less than two millions a day, and some times reaching three millions, made a demand upon the public resources wholly without precedent and greatly beyond what many regarded our ability to meet. Besides, intervention by at least two of the great European Powers for months seemed imminent, and a struggle between the Republic and the united civilized world. And what was still more disheartening to one in the position of Mr. STEVENS, he lacked confidence in the ability and skill both of our civil and military leaders, and in some important instances he had little faith in their devotion to the cause so dear to the general heart. The early decisions of the field were not always assuring, and even here there were not a few, timid and unbelieving, ready to flee at the first sign of irresolution on the part of our leader. Yet neither on the floor nor in the committee-room did his courage once weaken or his purpose grow infirm. On the contrary, we saw his energies increase with every new emergency, and his spirit rise buoyant as those around him became more desponding. Among the elements of our final success his unfaltering leadership at this cardinal period was not the least. While events were shaping themselves and the public judgment was baffled by the novelty of the situation, weakness, doubt, instability in that quarter would have been disastrous, might have been fatal. The unabated hostility toward him by the partisans of the rebellion is explained only by their consciousness of his unyielding and overmastering power.

The internal revenue system, the currency system, the national bank system, the form of the national debt originated at this juncture and under his direction. In no instance, I believe, did his individual views entirely prevail, and there were points upon which he was diametrically opposed by the action of the two Houses. Having known his opinions at that time, I could easily appreciate his feeling of injustice at the construction afterward given to certain scattered expressions, used, possibly, in reference to the predominant sentiments of others rather than to his own.

His subsequent career is too recent and too familiar to be dwelt upon. His theory of the rebellion and of the legal consequences of its overthrow, his views upon reconstruction, and the part he took in the late contest for precedence between the Legislature and the Executive are well understood. During the last year we all felt that his sands had nearly run; day by day we saw him borne into the Hall upon the arms of young men, weak as a child, but eager and attentive, whether the discussion turned upon foreign or home affairs. No subject was above his grasp, none beneath his notice. Treaty stipulations with a great Power and the salary of the humblest clerk alike found in him an advocate. Toward the close of the summer session nature made a final rally. For a few days the old vivacity returned, the brilliant repartee and unexpected sallies that all enjoyed so much. He himself felt the renewal of strength and a revival of hope and the future. It was the last glimmer of the expiring flame. We had scarcely dispersed to our distant homes before the telegraph announced that he was no more. And so he passed away in the mellow autumn of his age, having lived to enjoy the ripened fruits of the spring time planting and summer culture.

A maxim of one of the sages would have us wait until the end of a life before pronouncing it happy. A historian, closing the biography of one of the illustrious men of his time, exclaims, in the spirit of this maxim, "Tu vero felix, non vitæ tantum claritate, sed etiam opportunitate mortis." If a brilliant career be a happy one, and if that career be brilliant, which, unaided by wealth, family, or powerful friends, attains the front rank among the great leaders of a great epoch and makes a name for ban or blessing in every household of the land, then, indeed, is this champion of the oppressed to be accounted happy. But thrice happy in the opportune article of his death. Though the strength of manhood was gone, the babble and drivel of dotage had not supervened. He had seen his country emerge, after a long and painful strife, from the clouds and turmoil of civil war, and resume her place among the nations, freer, richer, stronger, happier, and more honored than before; entering upon a new era of prosperity and growth, excelling them all in the splendor of her renown, even as one star excellet another star in glory. The principles for which he had contended through a lengthened life had been recognized and adopted. His life-work was done, and who shall say it had not been done well? The Son of David has said there is a time to die; a time when to die is better than to live; and fortunate are they who are summoned at this auspicious moment, permitted to attain the full measure of their fame, but not to survive their reputation or their usefulness to mankind.

The character of Mr. STEVENS I shall not attempt. To his life-long friends its delineation will be a work of pathetic pride; I leave it to them, remarking upon two traits which seemed very prominent. The first was manliness as opposed to effeminacy. Not his

"The Dorian mood
Of flutes and soft recorders."

He evinced little respect for mere taste and refinement and delicacy and luxury and sentiment and the whole chapter of exqu Coastism, but delighted rather in the sturdier qualities of the heart and mind. The other trait was his exceeding liberality, extending alike to all, to the unthankful and the evil as well as to the grateful and the deserving. Where could be found a more unselfish friend? And never, surely, was there a more generous foe. Oppression and distress never appealed to him in vain. The humblest obscurity did not escape his notice. Opposition to slavery was a moral necessity of his nature. As a legislator he was liberal to such a degree that his political associates deemed it necessary to provide a counterpoise in natures less impulsive and sympathetic. His last effort in the House, if I mistake not, was an appeal for an appropriation to the public charities of the District of Columbia. Those who knew him in the private walks of life bear testimony to his own continual and abounding charity, and "charity shall cover the multitude of sins." We cannot wonder, therefore, that pious hands were there to close his dying eyes, making intercession with Heaven in his behalf, or that in the supreme hour devoted women should administer the holy chrism, efficacious, let us hope, beyond the teaching of our creeds.

To most men there comes, sooner or later, a period of inaction, of incapacity for further progress; when the world seems to them incapable of becoming any better, and every change is dreaded as likely to be for the worse. This is the period of conservatism, and usually comes with gray hairs and failing eye-sight. It converses with the past and distrusts the future. Its look is backward and not forward. This period Mr. STEVENS never reached. No good was ever attained without an attainable better. All his life he held the outposts of thought. Even in his closing hours, we are told, he found time for discourse of hopeful temper upon public affairs and to augur the success of an Administration he could hardly have expected to see.

As he was, so he will long be remembered. He has left his impress upon the form and body of the times. Monuments will be reared to his memory. Art will be busy with her chisel and her pencil to preserve his features and the image of his mortal frame. All will be done that brass and marble and painted canvas admit of being done. The records of his official acts will remain in your archives; our chosen words of commemoration will fall into the channels of literature. But the influence of a gifted mind in molding thought and giving direction to events is not to be measured by words of commemoration or by official records. It is as measureless as the soul and enduring as time. Long after the brass and marble and painted canvas have disappeared it will still remain, transmitted from age to age and through successive generations. "Quidquid ex eo amavimus, quidquid mirati sumus, manet, mansurumque est in animis hominum, in ceteritate temporum, fama rerum. Posteritati, narratus et traditus, superstes erit."

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, THADDEUS STEVENS was one of the most practical of men, though his whole life was colored and influenced by a vision. Timid men, and those who were without faith, called him dogmatic and impracticable, and others spoke of him as a theorist, who, to gratify a malignant or vindictive spirit, urged extreme measures regardless of the rights, interests, or sentiments of those they were to affect. They knew but little of the man they judged. How thoroughly practical he was is attested by the fact that he earned by teaching the rudimentary branches the means to procure his collegiate training; that having settled in a community in which hereditary wealth was deemed a prerequisite to a respectable position at the bar, he made no concealment of his poverty, and taught school while preparing for the practice of the legal profession and the acknowledged leadership of the bar of a large section of his adopted State; that he commanded the confidence of every judge before whom he appeared in his extended range of practice, and secured the affectionate regard of all his young professional brethren; by the frequency with which the people among whom he settled, whether of the York, the Adams, or the Lancaster district required him, at whatever sacrifice of prejudice on their part or of pecuniary interest on his, to represent them in the Legislatures of the State and nation, and conventions summoned for the consideration of the gravest topics; and, above all, by the commanding influence he exercised in every deliberative assembly of which he was a member.

I heard a prominent member of the Thirty-Eighth Congress say of Mr. STEVENS: "Let him go in what direction he may, it is always to the extreme," implying waywardness and inconsistency, and, in so far, misjudging him. He never labored in adverse directions. He sometimes accepted and supported propositions which were in general accord with his views, but to which he could not yield unqualified assent. He did this, as he once said, "because Congress is composed of men, and not of angels." He was incapable of acting inconsistently upon measures involving general principles. Against this reproach he was almost divinely panoplied. He had in his boyhood dreamed of a republic broader, grander, and more beneficent than the republic of Plato or the Utopia of Sir Thomas More—a republic in which every citizen might know the chastening influence of the family relations and the joys of home and pursue the secrets of science and the pleasures of literature; and believing, as he continued to do, in the progress of our race and the perfectability of our institutions, his public life was devoted to the realization of this, his boyhood's beautiful dream. When he dedicated himself to this work, in which he never faltered, the southern boundary of our country was near the thirty-first degree of latitude, and the course of the Mississippi defined its western limits; but he believed that the inspiring truths expressed in the Declaration of Independence, and embodied in our State and Federal Constitutions, would regenerate all the governments on the continent.

At the time of his birth the mouth of the Mississippi and the shores of the Gulf of Mexico were under the dominion of foreign potentates. He was, however, old enough to understand and remember the discussion that attended our first acquisition of territory—the Louisiana purchase—which extended from the Gulf along the west bank of the Mississippi to the Lake of the Woods; and though sometimes disapproving of the means by which they were gained, he welcomed each of the several acquisition of territory by which our country has come to stretch from ocean to ocean, to have a longer and more valuable coast line on the Pacific than any other nation, and to encircle the Gulf from Cape Sable to the Rio Grande. Every successive acquisition confirmed his faith and nerved his purpose.

The theory of Mr. STEVENS's ideal republic awarded home and culture to each industrious citizen. With this generous theory slavery was incompatible, and he was, consequently, the sworn and unrelenting foe of that accursed institution. He did not wage war upon slavery because he envied the wealth and power of the master. He was wont to thank God for having blest his youth with poverty, and was ever ready to confront the haughty master because his great heart sympathized with the outraged and helpless slave.

The severance of the Union would have dispelled Mr. STEVENS's faith in the ultimate redemption of the laboring people of the world from the ignorance and ill-paid toil to which they have ever been subjected. The breaking out of the slaveholders' rebellion seemed to rejuvenate him and inspire him with superhuman strength. He was always in his seat; and when sessions were so far protracted, as they sometimes were during the Thirty-Seventh, Thirty-Eighth, and Thirty-Ninth Congresses, that daylight came and dimmed the artificial light in this Hall, the old man's pungent witticisms would rouse many of the younger members from drowsiness and prostration. To maintain the Union he would have exhausted the country's resources in men and materials of war; and when the rebellion had been crushed he proposed measures that, had they been adopted, would have eradicated its cause and rendered its recurrence impossible.

He did not propose confiscation as a punishment to those whose great crime merited it. He was incapable of a vindictive act. He regarded the system of land monopoly, which had prevailed in the South, as the essential support of slavery, and he would obliterate it. He knew that the rebel leaders were conquered but not subdued, and appreciating the power they derived from the ownership of the land on which the body of the people were to labor and live he would deprive them of that power. He knew that the labor of the slave had given the land of the South its value, and he would reward the freedman by giving him a homestead as a slight return for the unrequited work he had done while a slave. He knew that the loyal soldier had saved the South to the Union and freedom, and he would invite him to dwell under his own vine in its midst, and by his counsels assist in its future government. He knew that a landed aristocracy and a landless class are alike dangerous in a republic, and by a single act of justice he would abolish both. Such were the humane considerations which prompted him to propose and support measures which the weak and time-serving denounced as harsh and vindictive.

The system of labor for wages, as it is exemplified in Great Britain and on the Continent, is as inconsistent with his ideal republic as slavery. Contemplating the ever-increasing volume of pauperism in the British islands, the unnatural and excessive toil demanded from women in the coal mines of England and Belgium, and from the tender children of agricultural laborers in the fen-gangs of England, his emotions might have been expressed in the indignant exclamation of the Abbe de la Menais, "But for labor at wages there is no name out of hell." That is not the freedom of which he had dreamed, which deprives childhood of its buoyancy, home of its charms, and supplants intelligent and sturdy youth by ignorance and premature decrepitude or binds the families of laborious artisans to a given locality by their interest in the parish poor rates or such inadequate wages as precludes the possibility of saving a sum sufficient for their own transportation to better markets for their labor.

Mr. STEVENS always believed that fidelity to republican principles required Government to protect those whose toil is the source of all prosperity against the wrongs and woes endured by the laboring people of countries in which social distinctions are recognized by law, and ancient evils are regarded as vested rights; and with what steadiness and power he endeavored to protect the wages of the American workman, by the imposition of adequate duties on the productions of the under-paid laborers of Europe, every gentleman on this floor knows. But he was no foe to commerce. In the Republic his youthful imagination pictured nature lent all her aids to the people. The fields gave forth rich harvests; the mines yielded their precious or useful stores; and each mountain stream, as it sped its way to the sea, lightened the burden of man by moving the machinery he guided without exhausting labor. The consumer and the producer were neighbors, the most perfect means of transportation facilitated exchanges of commodities, and the taxes imposed by middle men and the many agents required by trade with distant nations were saved to the producer.

Whether in the Legislature of Pennsylvania or the Congress of the United States no project for the development of latent resources or improved transportation that came within his conception of constitutional limits ever failed for the want of his support. In view of our almost limitless range of climate and soil, and boundless and diversified agricultural and mineral resources, he regarded our country as sufficient not only for its present population, but for hundreds of millions of people in the enjoyment of every material comfort and the refinements of a better than Augustan age. Regarding our country as the refuge of all who could flee from the inequalities of other lands, and the intelligence of the people as essential to its perpetuity, he held it to be the primary duty of the State to insure the proficiency of every child in "orthography, reading, writing, grammar, and arithmetic, which, by the experience of the world, are pronounced to be the rudimental branches of all knowledge." He would not consent to withhold the privileges of an elector from a man because he was illiterate, and thus punish him because the State had not done its duty by him in childhood; but he proposed that the Government should provide school-houses, teachers, and other appliances for the education of all children, and then further enact "that no father or guardian shall be permitted to vote at any election for any public officer who shall not have caused at least one half of the number of his children or wards between the ages of five and fifteen years, or if he have but one, that one to attend school during at least eight months within each of the years they are entitled to attend school."

To those who believe that the thing that has been is the thing that shall be forever, and that that youthful giant, the American Republic, shall never escape from the leading-strings in which he has consented to be held by those bed-ridden hags, the monarchies of Europe, these theories, doubtless, sound like the ravings of one bereft of reason. But those who know the attractive influence of power, and that the theater of our action is a virgin continent, with lakes, rivers, and coast lines capable of accommodating in our internal or domestic commerce a commercial marine far greater than that which now carries the commerce of the world, will regard them as the sure prophecy of the future that is before us. Mr. STEVENS believed in the possibility of the commercial independence of the United States. He also knew that when that should be achieved the people could bring their domestic relations into harmony with the fundamental ideas of their republican Government. Wise men will not think of him as a visionary because he anticipated coming events and proposed beneficent changes before the public mind was ripe for their reception. A great truth bravely uttered is never inopportune. Nor do time and age blunt the aptness of such utterances; and the advanced propositions and fervid words with which THADDEUS STEVENS so often stirred our blood and swayed our judgment will shape the future of the country. When the age is riper other lips will echo them with persuasive and conclusive force. Then the American people, instead of asking the little nationalities of Europe what they may do, will dictate the internal policy those nations must adopt on pain of seeing their most valuable citizens, allured by our happier condition, come to swell the power and grandeur of the great Republic. Then will his dream be fulfilled, and then will the world behold the fitting monument of Pennsylvania's greatest statesman, THADDEUS STEVENS.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I feel no embarrassment in rising to unite my voice with those who thus appropriately pay this last public tribute of respect to the memory of our late distinguished associate. The wide divergence in opinion between us on the leading questions of the times cannot deter me from the expression of a just homage to his character as a man, whether considered as a citizen or as a statesman.

As when living we recognized him as one of the foremost intellects of this House, so now, that being dead, let us forget the controversies which divided us, and remember only the higher qualities and personal attributes which have at all times commanded our attention.

The great poet has said:

"The evil, that men do, lives after them;
The good is oft interred with their bones."

Would that the reverse of this was true, so that the ill which men do should be buried with their bones, that the good, and the good only, will live after them.

Mr. Speaker, this is, indeed, an interesting occasion, not only in the performance of these rites and the personal remembrances it recalls, but in the contemplations and reflections it involuntarily forces upon the mind. It has been said that the disappointments in life are many and the successes tragically few. While this may apply to men in the aggregate, history and observation teach that the special man may make conquests from time, surmount difficulties, and attain the objects of his ambition. The sorrows, the trials, and tribulations of the general man result from the confidence reposed in and the deferred hopes of the eternal to-morrow; while the triumphs of the special man may infallibly be traced to his earnest action in the ever-living present—in the realities of to-day! Time is always capricious and often deceitful! To the youthful it is full of hope and golden promise. In the aged it fosters those fond anticipations, but prolongs their realization; and, while human expectation is most sanguine, it coquets with our hopes, and, it may be, flits from our grasp.

The force and reason of these remarks are happily illustrated by the life and example of that exalted citizen whose memory we now celebrate, to whose intellect and personal worth we now pay homage. With him there was no to-morrow in life. He was truthful to his instincts, to his nature, and his public career displayed the increasing activity of an ever-present to-day.

Mr. STEVENS was a man of rare natural mental power, which, together with much self-reliance and entire independence of character, rendered him at once the formidable and successful leader. He relied upon these qualities more than upon the common resources of inferior men who yield to the errors and prejudices of the times rather than suffer defeat. Himself a man of conviction, but not of policy, he despised those who sacrificed the former to the latter.

A bold thinker, and yet bolder actor, he had no patience with those who have no higher idea of the noble profession of politics than to obtain success by any means and at every hazard. Of a self-reliant temperament he would not conform to the prevailing conventionalism of the day. He was a candid man. Whatever mistakes of judgment the world may attribute to him, they were not assumed for a purpose. Caring little for popular favor or prejudice, he pursued the even tenor of his way, enforcing the doctrines he advocated with an earnestness and power which no man could have done who did not himself earnestly and honestly believe them to be right. He utterly contemned deception and hypocrisy. Those of us who served with him on committees, and who were brought into frequent personal intercourse with him, will bear testimony to the frankness and malice of his bearing. Though tenacious in adhering to his own view he granted the largest indulgence to the views of others in the discussions in this House.

Well, indeed, may it be said of him that he was a special man, an embodiment of original personal individuality. Whether his influence was exercised for the good of his country this is not the occasion to discuss, nor can it be supposed that the present moment can well decide. Identified with the present revolutionary era, in which he was one of the chief revolutionists and most prominent leaders, time, and time only, can determine whether the talents and characteristics to which I have referred were of injury or benefit to his country. In my judgment, this generation will not survive their unfortunate influence. Be that as it may, he is gone—and gone forever. He has passed to "The undiscover'd country, from whose bourn

No traveler returns."

That he has left his impress upon the present page of our history none can dispute; that he possessed many many qualities none can deny; that he was a thoroughly honest, as well as a truly great man, all will admit. Let us pass him to the grave as we hope others will pass ourselves—forgetting the frailties incident to our natures, and which appear to be inseparably connected with our being.

Mr. BROOMALL. Mr. Speaker, few statesmen of any country have maintained throughout a long public life the steadfast adherence to principles laid down in early manhood which characterized THADDEUS STEVENS. Universal education, equality of human rights, the elevation of the weak, the poor, and the oppressed were not more ardent aims and objects to him when he first espoused the cause of human progress than when three quarters of a century had rendered his infirm body an ill match for his still young and vigorous mind.

Too frequently in men of all stations the generous impulses and noble sentiments of youth give place, with advancing years and prosperity, to that fossil petrification of humanity called conservatism, which is nothing more than the want of ability to see the line of progress marked out by the hand of Omnipotence and the want of energy to follow it. But this dry rot of the soul never tainted THADDEUS STEVENS. One of the last acts of his old age was the preparation of a plan for thorough and universal education in the District of Columbia, and among the first of his early manhood was the patronage, almost the parentage, of the common-school system of Pennsylvania. Those who have heard him within a year, and when he required support to stand, denounce, as we know how he could denounce, the bare suggestion of reconstructing the South without providing for universal suffrage, are irresistibly carried back to the period long years before when he stood up almost alone in the constitutional convention of his adopted State the advocate of the cause of self-government against those who found it prudent silently to outvote the man they did not dare to answer. In contrasting the two pictures the mind is led to believe and to wonder that in the lapse of thirty years the man had grown no older.

His conduct in that convention is a lesson to the young statesmen of his country. The cause of universal suffrage, which he espoused was then an unpopular one, and there seemed little prospect of it ever being otherwise. The slaveholders of the South had long seen that if the voice of the black man could be heard in the North their hold upon their human chattels would in time become insecure. With their usual sagacity they had induced northern politicians by flattery and patronage to enter their services as voluntary bondsmen. These bondsmen had created a public sentiment in the North which assigned to the black man a condition something between man and brute, or rather a condition sometimes the one and sometimes the other, as best suited their southern masters: man as an element of political power in his owner, man for the purposes of accountability and punishment, brute for all other purposes.

When the Pennsylvania convention of 1838 sat this public sentiment was at its height, and that body was made up, to a large extent, of these voluntary bondsmen. True to their vassalage they hastened to record their servility to the slave power by silencing, as they believed, forever the voice and the vote of the black man in the councils of the State. They thought it safe to do this. The victims were the few, the poor, and the powerless. It was in vain that STEVENS and those who felt with him protested against the shame and the wrong. The deed was done. Thousands of American citizens were disfranchised; and that, too, upon the spot where Penn. a century and a half before, had founded the purest system of self-government the world up to that time had ever witnessed; upon the spot where the fathers of the Revolution sixty years before had declared that all men are born free and equal, and had bound themselves by the most solemn obligation to write that holy sentence upon American annals with their blood. But when the work of the convention was complete, and the organic law came to be signed by the members, he who had done so much to make it in other respects what it is refused to give it the sanction of his name, and to this day the constitution of 1838 remains in the archives of Pennsylvania with one vacant seat.

Yet the man whose name should be there lived to aid in abolishing the institution in whose interests Pennsylvania had sacrificed her honor, and to see universal suffrage made the cardinal principle of American institutions. That missing name will be remembered with gratitude when the names and principles of those who so degraded their State have long been consigned to merited oblivion. Let the future statesmen of America learn that it is never safe to do wrong. Retributive justice is sometimes slow, but it is always sure.

The memory of THADDEUS STEVENS needs no monument. The imprint of his mind is upon the history of his country, and is more ineffaceable there than would be the image of his body upon marble. He was among the first to see that the contest into which we were forced in 1861 was war, not mere insurrection to be suppressed in sixty days, and that it must end in victory upon one side or the other with all its rights and disabilities. When that contest was at last over he was among the first to see that all civil relations preëxisting between the victors and the vanquished had ceased to be, leaving the latter wholly without civil government. Brushing away the ingenious sophistries with which a faithless Administration sought to bewilder the public mind in the interests of a fallen institution, he set about the work of reconstructing the conquered country in the interests of loyalty, progress, and the rights of man. To him more than to any other single individual is attributable the fact that eight States of the Union have been organized upon the basis of universal suffrage and three more are about to be. As long as self-government shall remain a principle dear to the American heart THADDEUS STEVENS will be remembered as its great champion. He needs no monument, yet Pennsylvania owes a tribute to her departed statesman. The time will come, and that speedily, when she will purge her organic law of all traces of the unhallowed institution, all evidences of her former vassalage. From a human stand-point it would seem that THADDEUS STEVENS should have witnessed that event; but it suited the purposes of an Inscrutable Power to decree otherwise. Let his beloved State do for him what he did not live to do for himself. When that day comes let the Governor of Pennsylvania, by virtue of a solemn act of her Legislature, on some day sacred to the cause of humanity, in the presence of all that is great and good within her borders, take from her archives the constitution of 1838, and reverently, with humiliation for the past and hope for the future, blot out forever the discrimination between man and man which God never made, and opposite the vacant seat write the name of THADDEUS STEVENS. Then will be accomplished what he lived for. Then will Pennsylvania be worthy to account him among the sons she has loved, honored, and mourned.

I cannot conclude the few remarks I arose to offer better than by quoting the language of my deceased colleague himself, in this Hall, upon the announcement of the death of Mr. Noell, of Missouri, whom he knew and with whom he sympathized:

"Other men more eloquent than he may have been called to the bar of judgment, but no man ever appeared before that dread tribunal with more numerous and ardent advocates. His advocates were the oppressed of every nation, the crushed of the satanic institution of slavery.

"Who would not rather take his chance in the great day of accounts, before that Judge who is the acknowledged Father of all men, than the chance of ordained hypocrites, miserable wretches who, professing to hold a commission from on high, impiously proclaim slavery a divine institution?"

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, in the death of THADDEUS STEVENS this House has lost one of its recognized leaders, and the nation one of her most distinguished sons. In his departure we shall miss another of the uncompromising heroes of our anti-slavery revolution. Elijah and Owen Lovejoy are entombed; the one at Alton, and the other at Princeton, Illinois. Adams and Pierpont sleep beneath the soil of their native Massachusetts; Theodore Parker at Florence, in Italy; William Leggett at New Rochelle, New York; Nathaniel P. Rogers by his native Merrimac; Gamaliel Bailey within the shadow of the national Capitol; Giddings and Morris and Lewis in Ohio; James G. Birney in New Jersey; David Wilmot and James Mott in Pennsylvania; John Brown at North Elba, New York; and there are others whose lives were as heroic and beautiful and unselfish, whose names I do not now recall. To these must be added more than three hundred thousand, the fallen heroes and martyrs of our liberating Army, who sleep on every national battle-field from the heights of Gettysburg to the banks of the Rio Grande. Pre-eminent among all this invincible army of heroes, prophets, and martyrs is Abraham Lincoln,

"The generous, merciful, and just."

With this grand army of unselfish patriots, his contemporaries and collaborators, we have laid down to rest all that is mortal of our friend in the bosom of his beloved Pennsylvania.

The benediction of millions followed him to his tomb, and to-day in the free home of every black man, and of all men who love liberty, there is sincere sorrow and mourning.

Never again in these Council Halls will he deliberate with the people's Representatives, nor awaken the nation from its lethargy by his genius and wonderful power.

The honorable gentleman whom his constituents have elected to succeed him on this floor, and those who have preceded me, have spoken so fully of his early life, his heroic struggles, and his personal history, that I need not add a single word.

Through some of the most eventful years in our history I have been intimately associated with him on this floor. During all that time, which included the darkest hours in the nation's life—hours which tested the constancy and courage of men—he bore himself with such unquestioned fidelity to the cause of human freedom as to command even the respect of political opponents and the cordial indorsement of all liberty-loving men.

As we engage in the memorial services of this hour, and bear him again in our hearts from this Capitol and the scenes of his struggles and wonderful triumphs, let the nation stand with uncovered head and its bells peal forth the solemn sound of an anthem more appropriate than any words of mine:

"Toll! Toll! Toll!
All mortal life must end.
Toll! Toll! Toll!
Weep for the nations' friend.
Oh! the land he loved will miss him.
Miss him in its hour of need;
Mourns the nation for the nation,
Till its tear-drops inward bleed.
Let bands of mourning drape the homestead,
And the sacred house of prayer;
Let mourning folds lay black and heavy
On true bosoms everywhere!
Toll! Toll! Toll!
Never again—no more—
Comes back to earth the life that goes
Hence to the Eden shore!
Let him rest! it is not often
That his soul hath known repose.
Let him rest!—they rest but seldom
Whose successes challenge foes.
He was weary, worn with watching,
His life-crown of power hath pressed
Off on temples sadly aching—
He was weary; let him rest!
Toll bells at the Capitol,
Bells of the land toll!
Sob out your grief with brazen lungs,
Toll! Toll! Toll!"

Mr. Speaker, though Death come never so often, he casts at the portals of the tomb shadows ever new and mysterious, and ever and always hath for the living his admonitions and his lessons.

By the side of the grave we all realize that there are voices whispering to us out of the shadowy silence beyond the river.

In such an hour we see with the natural eye "as through a glass, darkly," but we have the promise that if faithful we shall see "face to face." As there is no race of men without the idea of a God and a future life, so in the presence of death it is natural for all to pause and think of the life beyond.

What is to be the destiny of our friend in "that undiscovered country from whose bourne no traveler returns," it is wisely not given us to know. Let us hope that he has gone up into the presence of the God of nations and of men bearing in his hands some of the broken fetters which have fallen from the limbs of our four million emancipated bondsmen. These shall testify of his fidelity to justice and to his love of the human race.

In that great day, when the secrets of all hearts shall be revealed, I trust it may be said to him by the Father of all, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me." And that it will be said I may without presumption hope, for whatever may be the theories of men, whatever our hope for ourselves or for others in the life which never dies, let us trust that better than all our faiths, and more comprehensive than our grandest conceptions, an all-wise Creator has ordained a plan as broad as the universe, and as just as it is infinite, which will compensate in the future life every soul which has struggled and suffered for mankind in this.

Mr. Speaker, there are moments in the experiences of all when we cannot convey to other hearts the emotions of our own. To me such a moment is the present. So many reminiscences are crowding upon me, and so many wonderful scenes in which our departed friend was an actor are passing as a panorama before me, that I feel how short I should come of doing them or him justice were I to dwell upon them. No man who loves his country and passed through those scenes in these Halls can ever forget them. When I first entered this House, ten years ago, Mr. STEVENS was one of the first to take me by the hand and welcome me. From that day until the day of his death he was my friend, and often my adviser and counselor. However often I may have differed with him—as I often did—there was one question about which we never differed: the question of the necessity of the immediate and unconditional abolition of slavery. Of the practicability and justice of destroying slavery he never doubted. I am thankful that he was spared to witness the end of that indescribable villainy. I rejoice to know that as the gates of the Eternal World opened up before him he was permitted to look back upon the land he loved and nowhere behold the footprints of a single slave. Because of his unwavering fidelity to the poor bondsmen, who, in the presence of a nation of oppressors, were manacled and powerless and dumb, I came to venerate him; and because I venerated him I come to-day to cast a garland upon his tomb. In this selfish world there is nothing which so strongly enlists my sympathies and so much commands my admiration as a heroic and unselfish life spent in the interests of mankind. To me it is the most touching and beautiful of all human struggles.

In espousing the cause of the slave, more than forty years ago, Mr. STEVENS voluntarily accepted social and political ostracism, and patiently endured the persecutions of ignorant and maddened men, for whose highest interest he was laboring. He did this without fee or hope of political reward, simply because he believed it to be right; and because he was right we shall some day see the children of the men who stoned him gladly join hands with the liberated slave in bearing back the stones, in the shape of blocks of whitest marble, with which to build his monument.

I do not assume to write his epitaph. In a speech delivered in this House January 18, 1865, he said—I read from volume fifty-four of the Globe, page 266:

"I will be satisfied if my epitaph shall be written thus: 'Here lies one who never rose to any eminence, and who only courted the low ambition to have it said that he had striven to ameliorate the condition of the poor, the lowly, the downtrodden of every race and language and color.'"

The grand blows which he struck in his great battle for liberty and justice will long survive him and leave their impress upon all lands, strengthening the purpose of the toiling and struggling millions of earth. His successful life-battle should teach us the value and self-sustaining power of a life consecrated to the best interests of his country and his fellow-men.

In this impressive hour, while reviewing his heroic and unselfish acts, let us renew our vows of fidelity to the great principles which he so long, so ably, and so faithfully maintained. Let us here, and now, pledge our lives anew to the cause of human liberty and human progress, resolving that no obstacle nor selfish interest shall cause us to falter, so that when we descend to the tomb the benedictions of mankind shall bless us, as they now bless him for whom we mourn, and it shall be said of us as it is now said of him:

"He hath not lived in vain."

After a long and stormy battle, with a record which the friends of freedom will ever cherish, full of years and crowned with honors, he—

"Has gone from this strange world of ours.

No more to gather its thorns with its flowers;

No more to linger where sunbeams must fade;

Where, on all beauty, death's fingers are laid.

Weary with mingling life's bitter and sweet;

Weary with parting and never to meet.

Weary with sowing, and never to reap;

Weary with labor and welcoming sleep.

In Christ may he rest," from sorrow and sin

Happy, where earth's conflicts enter not in.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, during the recess of Congress my venerable colleague, Hon. THADDEUS STEVENS, of the ninth district, passed from the turmoils of life to the peace and quiet of the tomb. He was participating with us in legislation when we adjourned on the 27th of July last, and although he was enfeebled in bodily health I joined with many others in an earnest hope that he would be spared to meet with us when we again assembled here for the transaction of business. The realization of that hope has not been vouchsafed to us. On the 12th of August last, at one o'clock a. m., at his temporary residence within a short distance from the Capitol, he died.

THADDEUS STEVENS was born on the 4th of April, 1792, in the town of Danville, Caledonia county, Vermont. The pecuniary circumstances of his parents being limited, they were unable to furnish means for his education. Animated with a purpose to succeed, through his own perseverance and energy he was successful in acquiring a liberal education. Upon the completion of his collegiate course he bid adieu to his native State and home, and in the year 1814, at the age of twenty-two, reached the borough of York, Pennsylvania. Teaching school for a livelihood and studying law in the spare hours that intervened, he gradually prepared himself for the stern intellectual conflicts of his after life. He was admitted to the bar in Adams county, and soon rose to the head of his profession.

His oratorical powers, general information, and keenness of wit gained for him a State-wide celebrity. As an advocate he was quick and powerful. Laying hold of the strong points in a cause he presented them in a succinct and comprehensive manner. A large and lucrative professional practice flowed in upon him, and almost at the outset he displayed that charity and generosity of his nature which distinguished his entire life. He was always an ardent friend of public improvement and universal education, a bitter opponent to human slavery and oppression. In 1833 he became a candidate for the State Legislature, and was elected and reelected almost without opposition up to 1836, when he was chosen a member of the convention to revise the constitution of the State. During his services in the Legislature and constitutional convention the attention of the country was attracted to his peculiar opinions, capacities, and character. With a cultured mind, formidable in debate and fearless in expression, he immediately became a leader and foremost in every movement that contemplated the improvement of the people and of his adopted State. In the convention for the amendment of the State constitution he was a violent opponent to the insertion of the word "white" as a qualification of voters, and opened upon its advocates all the invective of his ardent nature. But the crowning glory of his life is the noble disinterestedness, the manly courage, and the indomitable will displayed and exercised in the advocacy of the common-school system of Pennsylvania. To his tireless efforts are the people of his adopted State indebted for the incalculable blessing of free schools. Seconded in his efforts by the generous assistance of Governor George Wolf, he succeeded in having the school law passed, and when ignorance and prejudice sought and urged its repeal he again stood up in its defense. In a speech which abashed his opponents, and which the young of to-day still read with enthusiasm, he portrayed in a glowing light the grandeur of the system and the importance of mental culture in order to sustain a republican form of government. To-day its benefits are seen and acknowledged. To-day the ostentatious rich and the humble poor drink at its fountain. To-day, standing by the tomb of its originator, thousands pay tribute to his memory and worth.

Mr. STEVENS was prominent in the administration of Governor Ritner, and by him appointed canal commissioner. He subsequently realized that his undivided attention to politics had caused him to neglect his private affairs, and especially his large furnace in Adams county. He found himself involved in debts, said to exceed two hundred thousand dollars, caused mainly by his partner in the iron business. His ardent desire was to liquidate that indebtedness. The practice of the law at the Gettysburg bar offered little prospect for paying so large a sum, consequently he concluded to remove to a more extensive field, and finally selected Lancaster as his future abode. His extensive legal acquisitions and superior abilities secured for him a large and lucrative practice at his new home, which in a few years enabled him to liquidate his entire indebtedness. Standing at the head of his profession, his many generous traits, political tact, and superiority won the confidence and respect of his fellow-citizens. In 1848 he was nominated and elected to the Thirty-First Congress, and in 1850 was reelected to the Thirty-Second Congress. At the expiration of his second term he again devoted his attention to the pursuits of his profession. He was afterward elected to the Thirty-Seventh, Thirty-Eighth, Thirty-Ninth, and Fortieth Congress. Being a member of Congress during the most critical period of the nation's life, he displayed superior statesmanship and unflinching patriotism. Through all this stormy period his voice rang clear and loud, amid the pæans of victory and the glooms of national disaster, for the triumph of liberty and the permanency of the Republic.

Believing in the justness of our cause, fully impressed with the importance of our success, he advanced with a majestic tread toward the realization of his hopes. He lived to see the Federal authority vindicated, rebellion crushed, and the constitutional eradication of that barbaric institution against which for more than half a century he waged his grand but merciless crusade. Then, the nation's power vindicated, its life rescued, its people freed, and its honor maintained, standing in the midst of his intellectual and political triumphs, with his fame national and his name immortal, death intervened and drew the curtain over the drama of his long and eminently useful life. We shall never forget the meteoric displays of his ponderous logic, his burning rhetoric, his withering sarcasm. They are a part of the history and glory of the American Congress. Sleeping in his honored grave in his adopted State, resting from earthly care and toils, the melody of his grand life still is sounding and rolling like the "heavings of the sea." His name, interwoven and commingled with the philosophy of our most momentous history, will flow without interruption down the lapse of ages, the accompaniment of the great drama of human progress. His example, so potent and talismanic in the furtherance of philanthropy, will grow brighter and brighter as time advances and bravery is honored. He passed away "with the calm composure of an old hero of romance who had come into the world with the birth-right of liberty for the peoples." He died nobly, as he had nobly lived, leaving his example as a guiding-star to the world.

"Fleet foot on the corse,
Sage counsel in cumber,
Red hand in the foray,
How sound is thy slumber!
Like the dew on the mountain,
Like the foam on the river,
Like the bubble on the fountain,
Thou art gone, and forever!"

Mr. ORTH. Mr. Speaker, the grave has closed over the earthly remains of one of freedom's most ardent and eloquent advocates. The voice once so familiar in these Halls is hushed in death; its sound no longer greets our ears, but its bold and fervid enunciations will never be forgotten.

That heroic devotion to truth and justice, to equality and fraternity we so often admired, and which is exemplified by countless acts and incidents extending through years and years of an active existence, is a most worthy example for all good men.

The principles which he professed and the work which he performed, professions and practice being in perfect harmony, will in all future time and in all nations render the name of STEVENS a synonym for human liberty.

Living in an age when opportunities for the accomplishment of great deeds abounded, he seized upon and improved these opportunities. His mind grasped the true philosophy of events, and his practical common sense molded it into forms of enduring usefulness. Living not unto himself his life has not been in vain, and the impress of his genius upon the age in which he lived will be as permanent as his fame.

The early history of THADDEUS STEVENS is similar to that of many of our ablest and most prominent public men. His parents were in indigent circumstances, and hence in his youth he was thrown upon his own resources, and taught those lessons of self-reliance which proved so valuable to him and to his country. He was born in the State of Vermont in 1792, and spent the days of his youth and early manhood among her people, whose thrift, energy, and frugality, long since proverbial, made a lasting impression upon his nature. He entered the academy of Peacham, and, by teaching during the vacations of school, he procured the means by which he was enabled to prepare himself to enter upon a collegiate course of studies at Dartmouth College, where, in due time, he graduated with distinction.

He often referred, with evident gratification, to his academic days at Peacham, and evinced his attachment for the old academy by frequent donations of books to its library, as also by a valuable bequest in his last will and testament. Leaving his New England home, he selected Pennsylvania as his future place of residence, locating temporarily in the town of York, where he engaged in teaching school while prosecuting his legal studies. He was admitted to the bar in 1817, and immediately located in Gettysburg, where he continued to practice his profession with assiduity and marked success for the ensuing twenty-five years. His studious habits, his classic education, his attention to business, and his eloquence and ability soon placed him and kept him at the head of his profession, at a time, too, when he was brought into frequent contact with some of the best legal talent of the State. His bearing in the presence of the court and bar was always dignified and courteous, his cases were thoroughly digested and understood, and while he guarded carefully their weak points, he readily perceived and took advantage of those of his adversary. In the examination of witnesses he was most successful, his pleasing and insinuating address gaining the confidence of the witness and eliciting a truthful recital of the facts, while his intimate knowledge of human nature enabled him at a glance to detect prevarication or dissimulation; and when detected he made the witness writhe under his unmerciful cross-examination.

He was invincible in the presentation of his facts, the application of the law to the testimony, and in the influence of his eloquence over the hearts and minds of the jurors.

Milton, one of his favorite authors, says:

"True eloquence I find to be none but serious and hearty love of truth."

And this love of truth was one of the strongest elements in the character of Mr. STEVENS, and enabled him so successfully to carry conviction to his hearers. He never practiced the arts of dissimulation, not merely because he was ignorant of their uses, but for the reason that his very nature, whose impulses he followed, led him to deal with perfect frankness and candor on every occasion.

He was equally candid with friend and foe, and nothing could induce him to betray the one or clandestinely injure the other. This virtue he practiced in the privacy of social life, at the bar, in his struggles on the political rostrum, and in the discharge of his severer and more exalted duties in the halls of legislation, and this, more than anything else, formed and increased the attachment of his friends and challenged the respect of his enemies. Did I say his enemies? Justice to his memory requires that I should rather use the words "political adversaries," for it is conceded by all who knew him that no man ever passed through such fierce and embittered contests, running through an active period of half a century, with so few personal enemies during his stay on earth, and no animosities extending beyond the grave. His love of truth made him an earnest man, acting upon the principle that whatever was worth doing at all was worth doing well. He never espoused a cause until he was satisfied of its merits and justice, and then brought to its advocacy all the strength and vigor of a richly cultivated intellect.

The cause of education always received his hearty support. To elevate mankind, to improve their moral, intellectual, and physical condition; in a word, to leave the world better than he found it, was with him a duty which he never neglected.

At the time of his first election to the Legislature of Pennsylvania that State had taken no steps toward the organization of a system of general education. The education of her children had been left to private or individual enterprise, or to the voluntary effort of the people in each particular neighborhood. The utter inefficiency of these spasmodic and limited efforts to educate the youth of the State or to diffuse intelligence among the people was apparent to all reflecting persons, but it belonged to STEVENS to make the inefficiency glaringly manifest, and to propose and carry into effect a proper remedy for the evil. He believed with Aristotle:

"That the education of youth ought to form the principal part of the legislators' attention, cannot be a doubt, since education first molds and afterwards sustains the various modes of government. The better and more perfect the systems of education the better and more perfect the plan of government it is intended to introduce and uphold. In this important object fellow-citizens are all equally and deeply concerned; and as they are all united in one common work for one common purpose, their education ought to be regulated by the general consent, and not abandoned to the blind decision of chance or to idle caprice."

The innovator upon immemorial usage is never a welcome visitor. He meets with obstacles at the threshold of his operations, and difficulties and impediments beset him at every step in his progress.

That education should be universal; that the indigent orphan should have the same opportunity for the acquisition of knowledge with the son of his wealthy neighbor; that the man of affluence should be taxed to educate the child of penury, were ideas at that time not only novel, but repugnant to the views of a large majority of the people of Pennsylvania, and hence the attempt to embody them in the form of legislative enactment met with stern and general opposition.

Mr. STEVENS was not the man to be swerved from his purposes by adverse opinions; he met argument with argument, conquered prejudice by the presentation of truth, and crushed the demagogue with his withering and irresistible sarcasm. Amid difficulties which might have appalled more timid men he entered upon the advocacy of the principle that all children are the wards of the Commonwealth, and that it is alike the interest and the duty of the Commonwealth to provide for their education.

The habits and opinions of a century do not readily yield to the demands of advancing ideas, and for years this question of universal education was the subject of animated and frequently of acrimonious discussion. It entered into the political contests of the day, and to such an extent was the opposition manifested that the motto "No free schools" was emblazoned on many banners, and became the shibboleth of partisan warfare. The contest was of long duration; but in all contests with error truth will eventually triumph, and his adopted State now justly exults in having, through his instrumentality, one of the best systems of popular education in the Union.

Many of his best friends at the time feared the effect of his bold advocacy of so unpopular a measure on his future political prospects; but this was a consideration which never entered his mind, and his course on this question, like all the great acts of his life, exhibited the unselfishness of his nature.

In addressing his constituents at Gettysburg, while this question was agitating the people, he said:

"I shall feel myself abundantly rewarded for all my efforts in behalf of universal education if a single child educated by the Commonwealth shall drop a tear of gratitude on my grave."

During his residence at Gettysburg an academy or gymnasium was organized by a few of the prominent citizens, and STEVENS soon conceived the idea of building on this modest foundation an institution of more enlarged pretension and of much wider usefulness. Through his influence as a member of the Legislature a charter was obtained changing the gymnasium to "The Pennsylvania College;" and what is most remarkable, he also secured a donation from the State of an amount of money sufficient to erect for the college its principal and most costly edifice. The consideration for this munificent grant was the gratuitous education by the college of a specified number of indigent young men who might from time to time avail themselves of this privilege, and the further condition that the German language should constantly be taught in the institution, which conditions have at all times been most faithfully performed. He was prominently and actively connected with the material and educational interests of the college, as a member of the board of trustees, from its organization to the time of his death.

The trustees have recently erected an additional edifice to be used in connection with the college, which, in honor of his friendship for the institution and the interest he manifested in its success, has most appropriately been named "Stevens's Hall."

He was a zealous advocate of free speech, concurring fully in the sentiment of Jefferson, that "error of opinion can safely be tolerated so long as reason is left free to combat it."

To him the idea was most preposterous that there shall be any subject so sacred as to forbid examination or debate. Whatever seeks to avoid scrutiny or shrinks from investigation is justly subject to suspicion, and that which cannot bear the test of thorough discussion is in its nature inimical to republican institutions.

I remember an incident, which occurred during my schoolboy days at Gettysburg, at once illustrating his devotion to the cause of free speech and his influence over the minds of those with whom he was brought in contact.

In 1837 the anti-slavery question began to be agitated in various parts of the country, and Professor Blanchard, of Cincinnati, one of the earliest advocates of emancipation, visited Gettysburg for the purpose of delivering a series of anti-slavery lectures. The very announcement of his purpose created an intense excitement in the community, for Gettysburg is situated within a few miles of the old Mason and Dixon's line, and an abolition lecturer would have been just as welcome in Maryland as in the border counties of Pennsylvania.

The professor called his meeting and challenged discussion. The challenge was accepted by two of the most prominent citizens of the borough; but at the close of the debate resolutions were passed deprecating any further agitation of the subject, and plainly intimating to the professor that his presence was no longer desirable in that community—a hint which in those days was very generally understood.

Mr. STEVENS had been absent on professional business; but on his return, learning what had been done, another meeting was called, and the court-house was soon filled with an angry and excited audience. He requested some friend to move a reconsideration of the resolutions, and then proceeded to address the meeting. Those who heard his effort on the occasion will never forget it. His manner was calm, deliberate, impressive, and the excited crowd listened with earnest attention. To listen was to be convinced. Warming gradually with his subject, he enforced the right of free discussion on all subjects with a power and an eloquence which his audience had never heard. The sacred rights of American citizenship, secured by constitutional guarantees, were defended by a master hand. In turn he used persuasion, entreaty, argument, wit, and sarcasm, until finally, turning to his old neighbors and friends, he appealed to their sense of honor and justice, to their individual reputation and the reputation of their community, as deeply involved in their contemplated proceedings; and when he took his seat the resolutions, which had been previously adopted without a dissenting voice, found no one bold enough to advocate their passage. On the contrary, a new set of resolutions were introduced and passed with singular unanimity affirming the right of free discussion and inviting this early anti-slavery missionary to continue his labors.

The triumph was complete, not only for Mr. STEVENS, but, what was infinitely more gratifying to him, it was a triumph of reason over prejudice; and I need hardly add it was the last attempt to apply the "slaveholder's gag" in that portion of our country.

He was the firm friend of the oppressed and the implacable enemy of the oppressor. Like the great Wesley before him he regarded the institution of American slavery as "the sum of all villainies," and suffered no occasion to pass unimproved, when in his power, to expose its monstrosity or destroy its vitality.

He was ever ready "to proclaim liberty throughout the land and unto all the inhabitants thereof;" and when the institution began to crumble and fall, amid the crackling flames of that rebellion which it had instigated, he felt like exclaiming, with one of old:

"Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, according to thy word, for mine eyes have seen thy salvation."

While practicing his profession at Gettysburg the cases of fugitive slaves were quite numerous, and where arrests were made which came to his knowledge he invariably volunteered his services to defend the alleged fugitive; and it is among the reminiscences of the neighborhood that he seldom if ever failed to secure the freedom of his clients.

On one occasion, while journeying to Baltimore for the purpose of replenishing his law library, he stopped for the night at a hotel in Maryland, kept by a man with whom he was well acquainted. Soon after his arrival he discovered quite a commotion among the servants at the hotel; and a woman in tears approached him and implored his assistance to prevent the contemplated sale of her husband, who was a slave. On inquiring who and where her husband was, she replied, "Why, Massa STEVENS, he is the boy who took your horse to the stable." STEVENS knew the "boy," and at once went to his owner and expostulated with him in reference to his sale, and at length offered to pay him $150, half the price, if he would restore him to liberty. The landlord was inexorable, and STEVENS, knowing the relations between the slave and his master, replied, "Mr. —, are you not ashamed to sell your own flesh and blood?" This stinging appeal only brought forth the response, "I must have money, and John is cheap at $300."

Prompted by his generous nature STEVENS purchased and manumitted "John," and then retraced his steps to Gettysburg, without completing his journey to Baltimore. At that time $300 was a large sum of money for one who had been but a few years at the bar, and he postponed the replenishing of his law library to a more convenient season.

The word charity in its broadest sense fails to express the boundless benevolence of his heart. He was never so happy as on those occasions when he could assist the suffering, relieve the distressed, and comfort the needy.

No one ever applied to him for assistance and was refused. While struggling with poverty himself he gave the widow's mite, and when afterward success attended him his bounties were increased in corresponding ratios. He was not only "a cheerful giver," but in these matters he was not willing that the right hand should know what the left hand had done. He preferred that his charities should descend quietly as the dews of heaven, and like the summer breeze, be felt but not seen.

Like Cornelius, he "gave much alms to the people;" in fact he was the almoner of Gettysburg during his long residence there, with this wide difference, that he made distribution only of his own means, and never limited his benefactions to the tenth of his income.

When lurking treason, which had been nursed for years in our country, by men high in favor with the people and high in official station, culminated in civil war, STEVENS was a most prominent and influential member of this House. His whole life had witnessed his devotion to the country, to those fundamental principles proclaimed in the Declaration of Independence, and his faith in their ultimate incorporation into the national Constitution.

The first hostile gun of the rebellion convinced him that the accursed institution of slavery would be overthrown, that the Union would survive the shock of battles, and that the conflict would evolve a purer republicanism and an advanced spirit of humanity.

His efforts in and out of Congress were devoted to a vigorous prosecution of the war, to devising ways and means for such prosecution, and to keep the public mind firmly fixed upon the true nature of the assault upon the Union and its defense, and thus to have it prepared to accept those truths which he foresaw would inevitably result from a victory for the Union.

The patient, self-sacrificing endurance of our people and the valor of our soldiers at length crushed the rebellion, and reestablished, so far as military power could reestablish, the authority of the national Government. With the cessation of hostilities came questions of civil polity, as important as they were novel, requiring solution and permanent adjustment. The public mind was unsettled, conflicting opinions most naturally forced themselves to the surface, while political theories, formed on the narrow basis of old passions and prejudices, claimed public attention. Here was a field for the statesman, and STEVENS entered it with that self-reliance with which a consciousness of his own power and the strength of his political convictions invested him. Others doubted and hesitated, but to him the future was as unclouded and as certain as the past. He was no revolutionist, but, penetrating through the gloom of battles and the uncertainties which troubled most minds, he perceived the end from the beginning, and when the end came he was prepared to meet its demands and its responsibilities.

The apparently popular heresy that the States in rebellion had not by that act changed their "proper practical relations" to the Union, and hence were at once restored to their former position, was soon dissipated by the sturdy blows it received under his leadership.

With the abandonment of this theory the true policy to be pursued toward the States and people lately in rebellion was easily ascertained, and the emphatic indorsement of that policy by the voice of the nation, together with the gradual accomplishment of its purposes, have demonstrated alike its wisdom and its justice.

He is gone. He has finished his course on earth, but the great work to which he devoted so many hours of patient thought and honest toil is not yet finished. The high aim of his life, that to which he brought all the energies of his nature, which enlisted the warm sympathies of his noble soul and engaged the powers of his vigorous intellect, was to have his country free and all her people equal, to have a land

"Where manhood reigns alone,
And every citizen is king."

Freedom has been obtained, but freedom has not yet been secured, and will not be secured until all our people shall have the full enjoyment of perfect equality by the law and before the law. Freedom without secured equality of rights is a delusion and a snare; and although his countrymen have in his memory and in his deeds a rich legacy which they will always cherish with pride and with honor, yet with this legacy is coupled a responsibility, and that is to proceed with the work in which he was so zealously engaged, to complete the structure in the spirit of its master workman. So complete it that from foundation-stone to turret, in all its parts and designs, there shall be no fault and no blemish; that the eye of the critic can discover no defects, and the heart of the patriot desire no change. So complete it that when finished it will meet with the approbation of all good men and the approval of a just God!

He is gone! That frail tenement of clay so lately moving among us is mingling with its kindred dust, but the name and fame of THADDEUS STEVENS will never die.

In all the coming years of time, so long as patriotism has a votary and freedom an advocate, his name will be lisped and his fame will be cherished by the countless millions of the future, and while his countrymen linger around his consecrated grave their aspirations will ascend to Heaven that a kind Providence who rules over the destinies of nations may grant to our beloved country many more such men.

Mr. KOONTZ. Mr. Speaker, the ordinary business of the day is suspended, that the House of Representatives may pay its tribute of respect to the memory of its departed leader. Since the last session of this Congress Hon. THADDEUS STEVENS, Representative from the ninth congressional district of Pennsylvania, ripe in years and in wisdom, and honored with the confidence and love of his fellow-countrymen, has passed from time into eternity. No word in commendation of his distinguished services to the country or in praise of his great talents is needed in this presence, where he was so well known; nor are the eulogies that are pronounced here on this occasion necessary to convey to the nation a correct idea of the characteristics of the deceased. A prominent actor in the mighty events which have transpired within the last eight years, he stands out in marked distinctness before a people who have watched with intense pleasure his devotion to country, with unbounded admiration, the exhibition of his commanding talents, and who have on frequent occasions been swayed by his resistless, burning eloquence.

But if the tear of sorrow is shed for and the word of tribute spoken of the less distinguished of earth who have passed from the stage of life, with how much more sorrow should we mourn those who are numbered among the nation's dead! When they who have achieved distinction in war, statesmanship, oratory, poetry, science or philosophy have "shuffled off this mortal coil," the rivalries that were begotten in the busy arena of life are remembered no longer, the peculiarities of character that excited hostility in the breasts of others are forgotten, and a generous people remember only the ability and virtue of the deceased and treasure them as evidence of the nation's advancement in civilization; and as the enduring monuments of her own greatness and glory.

The many years of distinguished public service of the deceased, his skill as a parliamentarian, his recognized ability as a leader, and the powerful influence he wielded in the councils of the nation gave him such prominence in the eyes of the American people that since his death they remember him not only as the leader of a great party, but as a great American statesman, whose name will be inscribed on the historic page along with those whom the nation delights to honor.

Of the prominent men of this generation perhaps none have greater claims to public gratitude than Mr. STEVENS. In Pennsylvania his name will ever be associated with the beneficent system of common schools, the establishment of which was owing to his ability, perseverance, and energy. The humblest lad in the rudest cabin within the limits of the State will live to bless the memory of THADDEUS STEVENS, for having placed within his reach the means of an education. If, according to the distinguished historian, Macaulay, the gift of Athens to mankind of intellectual knowledge constitutes her chief glory, and will perpetuate her memory, even in the decay of her language and the degeneracy of her people to the remotest posterity, amid the rise and fall of kingdoms and empires, may it not truthfully be said that the people of Pennsylvania owe a debt of gratitude to Mr. STEVENS for this great gift to her sons, which will exist as long as her mountains stand, and that his memory will be preserved by them while their language remains to speak his praises?

But, passing beyond the confines of his adopted State, we find that his name is widely known throughout the country, and that by his public course he has earned a nation's gratitude. A gigantic civil war threatened the life of the nation and its public men were put to the severest test. Mr. STEVENS at once rose into marked prominence by his determined and powerful hostility to the rebellion, its aiders and abettors; and his opposition, after its overthrow, to all measures looking to the political ascendancy in the Government of those lately in arms to destroy it, made him the idol of the loyal millions of the country. Other men might be misled either by a mistaken notion of what was due to traitors, or a false philanthropy, or wicked ambition, or desire for party predominance, but there was an abiding faith in the loyal people of the country that in THADDEUS STEVENS there was "no variability or shadow of turning," and that in all the mutations of time and tergiversations of men, he would be true to the cause for which their sons and brothers had fallen. His career to its close vindicated fully the popular confidence in his fidelity to principle.

In foreign Governments the noble men who are inaugurating movements looking to the disenfranchisement of the masses from kingly and aristocratic rule lament his death, and in this hour of sadness and sorrow we have their deepest sympathy. There is always a strong tie between men of enlarged minds and comprehensive intellects, although there may be wide differences of opinion between them as to the best mode of advancing the interests of society and the promotion of the welfare and happiness of mankind; but how much stronger the tie that binds the men who are moving together in the great cause of humanity! The champions of liberal principles in every clime realize that one of their noble band is no more, and not only a State and nation, but oppressed humanity everywhere, deplore the death of the great advocate of human rights.

But his memory will be fondly cherished by that large body of people so recently liberated from human slavery. An early opponent of that institution, he battled against it with all the power of his gigantic intellect, until the last shackle of the last slave was broken, and this day he is revered by them next only to the immortal Lincoln. His name is a household word in the humble cabins of four million people whom he has helped up from the degrading condition of bondage into the blessed light of freedom, and will be inseparably linked with that great act of national justice by which the emancipation of a race from servitude was achieved.

As a private citizen he was kind and generous, and always ready to lend a helping hand to the needy and distressed. In public life he was remarkably candid and unreserved in expression of opinion. There was as little danger of mistaking his views on any subject of public interest, as that his antagonists would not feel the strength of his powerful intellect in enforcing them. He has been aptly styled the great Commoner of the United States. In many respects he was like the great Commoner of England. Like him he was bold and fearless in the advocacy of the measures he espoused. Like the elder Pitt he was not sordid. His worst enemy could not say of him that he enriched himself at the expense of the public. Like him he carried his measures often by his terrible earnestness, often by his withering sarcasm and fiery invective. Like him he rose into great and commanding influence in the nation, and successfully carried out the measures he had so dauntlessly advocated.

But, sir, time does not permit me to extend these remarks. A great man has fallen. This Hall will no longer resound with his eloquence or the nation be thrilled with his patriotic utterances, but in the ages to come, the heart of the patriot and lover of humanity will swell with joy and gratitude, at the mention of the name of THADDEUS STEVENS.

Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Speaker, as a representative of one of the new Commonwealths of the great West, I would add a few words to the tributes which have already been paid to the memory of Mr. STEVENS. The West owed him much. Although born amid the mountains of Vermont, and representing here an inland district of Pennsylvania, his heart was as broad and liberal as his brain, and embraced in its great scope every portion of the continent. His sympathies were especially active in behalf of those new communities whose destiny has been to subdue the wilderness and spread in constantly widening circles the domain of society and civilization. It is especially fitting, therefore, that the West should add to the wreaths which already adorn his bier.

In every aspect in which we consider him Mr. STEVENS was a great man.

No one who ever knew him could doubt the prodigious force and vigor of his intellect. It seemed to embrace all the diversified subjects of legislation incident to a great country and a high degree of civilization. While there might be here and there a member who, upon some special topic, surpassed him, there was no man in Congress who was so thoroughly conversant with such a multitude of subjects. A singularly retentive memory held ever ready for use the experience and the learning acquired during a long and industrious life. The movements of his mind were as original and peculiar as they were rapid and accurate. His power in debate was unequalled. His replies were such as could not be anticipated. He flashed back upon his opponent from some new standpoint, or with some quaint conceit that astonished while it confused him. His irony was terrible; it was withering; it denuded sophistry to the bones. It left no room for reply. The adroitness acquired during long practice at the bar was everywhere manifested in his conduct of debate. He knew when to strike and when to loosen his hold, and when to yield the non-essentials to save the essential, but he never forsook his purpose.

An intellect of this nature, accompanied by a degree of physical vigor which carried the vivacity of youth and the endurance of manhood far into the domain of old age, would have made Mr. STEVENS a marked man in any position in life and in any age of the world. But behind this intellect there was a character still more remarkable. Behind this brain-power there lay a will-power which has rarely been equaled among the sons of men; an intensity of purpose which no obstacle could arrest, no defeat daunt, and a determination of character which brightened with every encounter and rose freshened from every overthrow. Nothing could stand in the path of his purpose. That grim face never turned aside to catch the fickle murmurs of popular applause. Public opinion had no terrors for him. It should be written over his tomb that "he never played the demagogue." He never stepped down upon the lower plane of popular error, but at all times and on all occasions he dared to do right, looking heaven in the face and fearing no man. He never flattered the people; he never attempted to deceive them; he never "paltered with them in a double sense;" he never courted and encouraged their errors. On the contrary, on all occasions he attacked their sins, he assailed their prejudices, he outraged all their bigotries; and when they turned upon him and attacked him he marched straight forward, like Gulliver wading through the fleets of the Lilliputians, dragging his enemies after him into the great harbor of truth.

But all his intellect and character were secondary to the principles which underlaid them. These were, indeed, great and noble.

Nature had given Mr. STEVENS a generous heart. He was emphatically the friend of man. He seemed to feel that every wrong inflicted upon the human race was a blow struck at himself. He could not understand that a wrong could have any rights. He denied the power of time to sanctify injustice. The dust of antiquity could not screen from his indignant glance the horrible proportions of cruelty. He seemed to feel that there should be no peace in this world until every wrong was righted, and he believed that the true end of government was to right all the wrongs men suffer. He was the embodied spirit of revolution. In the great French struggle his oratory would have outblazed Mirabeau. He would have exulted in the glorious work of tearing to shreds monarchy and aristocracy, and lifting to their feet the poor, degraded, oppressed peasantry of France.

He would admit no compromise with wrong. It could neither smile nor frown, nor coax nor bully him into submission. Even the dark shadow of assassination could not turn him a hair-breadth from his path. He brought the spirit of John Brown into the work of the statesman. He led the assault against an embattled host of wrongs and errors, and under the providence of God they went down before him and left the field clear almost to the horizon. All honor in the day of peace to the gallant leader whose ringing voice never faltered amid all the surging uncertainties of the terrible struggle.

Against slavery as the mighty embodiment of all human wrongs Mr. STEVENS threw the force of his intellect and character from the very first. He felt with Mr. Lincoln that "if slavery was not wrong nothing was wrong." Its presence under the American flag he regarded as an outrage; it polluted the very air; it cried out with a million tongues to heaven; no fact, no incident connected with it but was a perpetual appeal to the human heart. Mr. STEVENS was from the first an uncompromising abolitionist—not yesterday alone, but thirty, forty, fifty years ago, when slavery was a sacred thing and its opponents were ranked among the criminals of the land.

Such sentiments for a long time excluded him from public life. At length came the great revolution. The blind wrong had dragged down upon itself the pillars of the temple. The curtain rose upon the grandest drama of the world; and the grim, iron-willed old man stepped forward to do his appointed work. His was the most striking figure of all the illustrious group gathered in that great scene. He had no doubts; no scruples; he did not weep over his opportunities; he exulted in them. He seized ax and brand and set himself to work to burn and hew out the giant wrong of American society, and the rigid lips never relaxed while he thought a single root or branch retained vitality. It was his privilege to live until the work of legislation was completed and the institutions of the country placed on the broad basis which his heart and judgment approved. His dying ears heard only the growlings of the turbid and bloody waves of rebellion as they settled and subsided into peace forever.

Mr. STEVENS regarded his labors in behalf of popular education as the crowning glory of his life. He was right. Here his enlarged philanthropy and his far-reaching statesmanship had fullest scope. The school-houses of Pennsylvania are his noblest monument. Innumerable generations yet unborn will, in that illustrious Commonwealth, preserve his name in perpetual remembrance as their first and greatest benefactor.

A life so complete does not ask our tears. Here is room only for pride and admiration, and gratitude to God that in the hour of our deadly need he raised up such a man to lead our national councils, and to infuse into a wavering nation his own indomitable spirit and his own magnificent love of right and horror of injustice. He passes into history, and the love of a great people gathers around and accompanies and hallows him. It can be justly said of him "he was the friend of man." The world holds no prouder eulogy.

Mr. CAKE. Mr. Speaker, the public man who works for fame rarely achieves it. If he does, he soon finds it a perishing uncertainty. After all, posterity is an inexorable judge, and no matter how the paid eulogist or the partial historian exaggerates what is good or palliates what is bad, Time's ultimate verdict is always discriminating and just.

THADDEUS STEVENS was a fine illustration of this theory. No statesman in any age so often took issue with what is called public opinion, but what might be better styled public prejudice. Emigrating to Pennsylvania more than half a century ago from New England, that normal school of the continent, and settling down among the retrogressive German population on the borders of a slave State, and sharing much of the intolerance of slavery, the very first thing he did was to take up arms for education and freedom. These were the pole stars of all his politics, and in following them he encountered more obstacles than ever beset the pathway of a public man. There is something sublime in his struggle with these obstacles. Undismayed he pursued the bitter path; undaunted he met the organized foe. No expediency, no compromise, no party turned him aside from his grand objective point. His efforts for universal education were crowned with victory earlier than his efforts against slavery.

But he was, if possible, more intense in his hostility to slavery than in his championship of education. Here he was the foremost teacher of the middle States. With a heroism that outlived censure and defied majorities, he maintained the unequal fight through more than a generation. Caring nothing for himself and nothing for party, if he could not mold the latter according to his principles, he aroused the most violent enmities and dared the most formidable combinations. If freedom won he was content; to secure that he was always ready to sacrifice everything else.

And now, Mr. Speaker, as we look back over the past eight years, is there one Republican who will not admit that if we had followed his lead from the first much of the resulting treachery, bloodshed, and death would have been avoided? We have reached the remedy at last; and what is that which gives us safety, which secures the rights of millions yet unborn, but that great remedy of THADDEUS STEVENS: justice, equality, and freedom to all men, irrespective of race, color, or nativity?

Mr. Speaker, our great leader did not work for fame. He did not play the courtier; he did not deal in the currency of compromise; he did not flatter the people; he never was a beggar for their votes. And yet, behold! He is remembered, and honored in his remembrance, by friend and foe. Look at this House to-day. Recall the loud acclaim of sorrow that mourned his death while it conceded his matchless attributes, and tell me, sir, if this is not genuine fame, the fame resulting from a bold, manly, rugged, and unselfish career, unsought, untolled for, yet freely tendered by a proud and grateful country, without distinction of party, sect, or creed?

Mr. Speaker, it is not often that one man can do so much for any people as THADDEUS STEVENS has done. But for him Pennsylvania would have been, perhaps, the last of the old free States to establish a system of education based upon taxation of the whole population. But for his example our seminaries of learning would have been inferior and few. Half a million of young men and women within our borders are this day chiefly indebted to him for the blessings of a sound education. I freely acknowledge my own indebtedness. When he delivered his great speech in the house of representatives of Pennsylvania in 1835 I was seven years old. All my schooling was attained in the institutions established under his policy, and I shall never forget him.

Reared in another political party, I never failed to cherish and honor his name; and when I entered the printing office in my thirteenth year, found myself equipped for a rapid and thorough understanding of the mysteries of that art of all arts. Later in life, when the war dissolved old party prejudices, and when, a democratic journalist, I found that as one of the advocates of Judge Douglas for President the honest logic of my convictions placed me in association with the Republican party, it was a natural progress for me to become one of the followers of THADDEUS STEVENS, and to oppose slavery as I had opposed all the antagonism of the school law.

Coming into this House at the close of the war, in which I did but my duty as a soldier and citizen, I looked up to him as my leader and my friend. I had never met him till I saw him on this floor; but there was no occasion that I did not find him a kind, intelligent, and generous mentor. Once, for reasons that I deemed conclusive to my mind, I voted against an appropriation to one of the colleges in this District. It was very nearly lost, when Mr. STEVENS asked me to change my vote, saying that he would give me his reasons for the request after the bill was disposed of. Upon the announcement of the result he turned to me and said: "Young man, let me implore you in all your after life never to oppose any measure for the education of the people. Follow this advice and you will never regret it."

Mr. Speaker, it is never becoming to cover the dead with unmerited eulogy, and in speaking these honest words of THADDEUS STEVENS I am not trying to make him a perfect character. Like all strong men he had his faults, and he neither denied nor defended them; but in the sterling traits of manhood he was a conspicuous example. The eloquent gentlemen who have preceded me have told you how brave he was in public life, how true to his convictions, how fearless in his support of all measures intended to elevate the people and to develop the resources of the country.

Not to-day, but in the time to come, will THADDEUS STEVENS be fully appreciated. His whole life was devoted to the cause of humanity, and he lived to see the fruition of his hopes in the most complete victory over the enemies of education in Pennsylvania and of freedom throughout our land. Congratulating himself upon his two great victories, he could peacefully fold his arms in the sleep that knows no waking upon earth, secure in the belief that he had accomplished a great work, and that those who profit by his life will revere his memory forever. The men and women who have been and are yet to be educated in the free schools of Pennsylvania, the bond who have been made free, and to free whom he gave the labor of his best days, are the beneficiaries of his noble life.

That which will stand to his honor as long as his record as a statesman are these proofs of his love for his fellow men. No great benevolence ever appealed to him in vain. No poor man struggling with adversity, no young man who sought his aid in the beginning of his career, no penitent rebel, impoverished by the war, ever asked THADDEUS STEVENS in vain for assistance. What is this but a religious example? How much better, Mr. Speaker, than the hollow profession which contents itself with words, and never ripens into glorious deeds! Leigh Hunt's beautiful allegory has often been applied to others, but it seems to have been written for THADDEUS STEVENS. Bear with me as I read it to you, and tell me if it be not a faithful picture of the great mind which, though the body it animated is dust, still lives to guide and strengthen the children of men:

"About Ben Adhem (may his tribe increase)
Awoke one night from a deep dream of peace,
And saw, within the moonlight in his room,
Making it rich, and like a lily in bloom,
An angel writing in a book of gold,
Exceeding peace had made Ben Adhem bold,
And to the presence in the room he said,
'What writest thou?' The vision raised its head,
And with a look made of all sweet accord,
Answered, 'The names of those who love the Lord.'
'And is mine one?' said Abou. 'Nay, not so,'
Replied the angel. Abou spoke more low,
But cheerily still, and said, 'I pray thee, then,
'Write me as one that loves his fellow-men.'

The angel wrote, and vanished. The next night
It came again with a great wakening light,
And showed the names whose love of God had bless'd,
And, lo! Ben Adhem's name led all the rest."

Mr. WOODWARD. Mr. Speaker, my acquaintance with Mr. STEVENS began in 1835. He was a man of mark from his first appearance in the Legislature of Pennsylvania, and he advanced at once in that body to the front rank of debaters, though the best talents of the State were then in the Legislature.

I well remember the passionate appeals by which he lashed our staid old Commonwealth into a frenzy of prejudice against the Masonic institution for its guilty agency, supposed or actual, in the abduction and murder of Morgan, not long before, in western New York. Mr. STEVENS made himself the great champion of the Anti-Masonic party, and the leader of those who elected Joseph Ritner Governor in 1835. Having accepted the office of canal commissioner from Governor Ritner, and retaining his seat in the Legislature as the representative of Adams county, he carried measures with a high hand for three years. Beyond all question he became the most influential man in Pennsylvania. The star of his fame culminated to its zenith. Doubtless his bold and earnest nature hurried him into many excesses of opinion, but it is creditable to his memory that in that day of his greatest power he was the eloquent advocate of a system of common schools which, though vehemently opposed in its origin, has grown into great favor with the people of Pennsylvania. Governor Ritner, like many of the Germans of our State, regarded the system with distrust, while Governor Wolf, who was Ritner's competitor for gubernatorial honors in 1835, favored its introduction. Mr. STEVENS staked his political fortunes on this measure. Alluding to the contest between Wolf and Ritner, and to its possible turn upon the school question, he exclaimed: "If this is to be a struggle between the powers of light and the powers of darkness, I go for him whose banner streams in light." His significant threat brought the Anti-Masonic party into the support of the school law.

It was during this period that I met Mr. STEVENS in a popular convention held in the court-house at Harrisburg, and which was called the "Integrity of the Union Convention." Alarmed at the tendency of the measures of New England abolitionists the people of Pennsylvania sent delegates to Harrisburg to strengthen the bands of the Union. Mr. STEVENS ridiculed the convention into nothingness. Affecting excessive solicitude for the "integrity of the Union," he brought his matchless powers of invective and sarcasm to bear against every measure that was proposed, and, with the adoption of some unimportant resolutions, the convention vanished.

I next met him in the "Reform Convention," a body elected in pursuance of law to propose amendments to the constitution of Pennsylvania. At first he took a very active part in the organization and debates of this body, but gradually his interest in its proceedings subsided until he withdrew himself almost wholly from its deliberations. He declined to sign the new constitution because the word "white" had been introduced into the suffrage clause before the word freeman, thus limiting suffrage to white freemen. On no subject were his opinions more firmly fixed than in favor of the social and political equality of the African with the Caucasian. Of this his course in Congress, which is known and read of all men, has afforded abundant illustration.

In the fall of 1838 the great political contest came on between David R. Porter, the Democratic candidate for Governor of Pennsylvania, and Governor Ritner, who was up for reelection on the Anti-Masonic ticket. Mr. STEVENS did his utmost for Ritner. He brought into full play not only all his great resources of eloquence, wit, and sarcasm, but as canal commissioner, having the control of considerable patronage, he also inaugurated a system of colonization for political effect, which politicians have improved upon and practiced more or less ever since. Porter beat Ritner in 1838, and then Mr. STEVENS made the capital mistake of his life in determining to treat the election as if it had not occurred. This brought on the "buckshot war." That disturbance made no strain upon our political institutions. Indeed, it is doubtful if it excited as much attention from the people of the other States as its importance demanded, but abroad it was looked upon as a portentous event. The late Mr. Dallas, our then minister at the Court of St. Petersburg, told me he was annoyed by daily notes from the whole diplomatic circle anxiously inquiring for the news from Harrisburg, while his correspondents at home treated the subject as too insignificant to allude to, and therefore he had no information to communicate. But the buckshot war, if it wrought no great political revolution, took Mr. STEVENS out of political life for many years. He removed to the city of Lancaster and addressed himself with great ability and success to the practice of his profession. It was my privilege to know much of him as a lawyer, and it affords me far more pleasure to contemplate his professional than his political career.

As a Pennsylvania lawyer he had learned to appreciate that greatest luminary of the bench, Hon. John B. Gibson, and at the May term of the supreme court, in 1863, Mr. STEVENS announced the decease of Judge Gibson in brief and exquisite terms. His neat speech, together with the more elaborate eulogy of Chief Justice Black, is printed in the seventh volume of Harris's State Reports, and both productions will well repay the perusal.

As a lawyer Mr. STEVENS was bold, honorable, and candid, clear in statement, brief in argument, and always deferential to the bench. He was not copious in his citation of adjudged cases. I think he relied more upon the reasons than upon the authorities of the law. Indeed, his tastes inclined him rather to the study of polite literature than of the black letter. He loved Pope's Essay on Man more than Siderfin's Reports. Yet he betrayed no defect of preparation at the bar. He always came with a keen discernment of the strong points of his case, and he spoke to them directly, concisely, and with good effect. His humor was irrepressible and trenchant; sometimes it cut like a Damascus blade. He was a lucky lawyer who would go through an argument with Mr. STEVENS without being laughed at for something. Mr. STEVENS's legal sagacity was exhibited here, in the presence of all of us, when he suggested the eleventh article of impeachment, which came nearer costing the President his official life than all the other articles together.

But, Mr. Speaker, I have said enough to indicate the high regard in which the deceased was held as a lawyer in Pennsylvania. Differing from him, totò calo, in politics and religion, I cannot think that the final influence of his great talents upon the public mind was salutary, nor do I think posterity, to whom the arbitrament belongs, will rank him as a benefactor of his race. But, nevertheless, there was much in him to admire. His honesty and directness of purpose, his courage, his scorn and contempt for the low arts of political tricksters; his generosity to the poor, for his hand and his heart were as open as the day to them; his learning, his eloquence, his temperance, his industry, his firm will, his self poise—these were the qualities that constituted his greatness and his excellence; and if his fame outlasts the age in which he lived, it will be because it is built on these foundations. "De mortuis nil nisi bonum." Dr. Johnson thought that for "bonum" we should read "verum." I approve the criticism, and I esteem it high praise of Mr. STEVENS that it can be said of him he so passed through life that his name can endure the application of the maxim even in its improved reading.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, among the people of Ireland, whose legends and poetry are frequently fringed with the silver foam of superstition, there is a venerable and ever-to-be-venerated custom, in the observance of which on meeting a funeral you turn with it, and for a time, however brief, become a part of the solemn procession. It matters not who treads the dark pathway to the grave, whether Death's footbeats have knocked at the castle or the cabin, to the rich and the poor, to the lowly and the lordly, is paid this universal homage, by to-day's living and to-morrow's dead.

Athwart my weary footsteps over life's rugged highway this funeral procession to-day occurs. He who in life provoked such enmities and secured such friendships is now beyond the reach of both, but as this pageant passes I uncover my head and mingle my footsteps in its solemnities.

Of his political opinions, his loves and hatreds, his passions and his prejudices, it is not for me here to speak. With many of them I never could, nor is it likely I ever shall, sympathize. My prejudices against him were as strong as his against others, and I must confess that on taking my seat here I should not have regretted had I been able to provoke a controversy with him, however much the odds might have been against me; and upon two or three occasions when he expressed dissent from my views I did not hesitate to intimate that it would not be disagreeable to me to receive his attack and break a lance with him. I had even gone so far as to look into the public records of his adopted State, over which his words and works are voluminously written, to see if I could find a crevice in his armor through which I might more successfully assail him. Had I provoked a controversy with him my temerity might have been made manifest to all, and might have betrayed me into language which to-day and for all time would be a cause of regret to me and mine. On two or three occasions when I addressed this House he came over to this side of the Hall and took a seat in front of mine, sometimes interrupting me with a playful or more serious observation, but seeming to give a pleasant refusal to my rash challenge, and to wish rather to encourage than to wound.

Is it unbecoming in me, therefore, now that his ear is forever closed to censure or to flattery, to say that my search for inconsistency in his public career was in vain; that he above all men seemed at least consistent in his opinions and singularly bold in expressing and defending them:

"To cowards and despots a hatred undying,
For freedom a passion intense and relying,
A pride in the resolute hand;
A hope that could see not a danger to shun
When bonds should be broken and liberty won."

Radically as we differed on measures in defense of which most of his time recently was occupied, there were many subjects on which we had kindred sympathies. For the oppressed people of Ireland, for the vindication of the rights of American citizens, for the speedier extension of citizenship and suffrage to our immigrant population he had strong and pronounced opinions. And to me it is a source of regret that his voice will not be heard nor will his influence be felt in the discussion and settlement of these questions; that in the great contest which I fear is approaching on one of them his clarion voice will not be heard as it would have been had he lived, rallying his followers and partisans to the defense of the Declaration of Independence, which he contended guaranteed to the governed the right of choosing their governors by universal manhood suffrage, as well for recent emigrants from despotisms in Europe as for immediate emigrants from slavery everywhere.

We have all observed the frail and yet tenacious hold which he appeared to have on life. Nature had given him many difficulties to conquer; society had bestowed on him but few of its smiles. His life seemed to me a life of sorrow sufficiently marked to explain, if not to excuse, his apparent bitterness. No kindly voice to whisper comfort in his sorrows; no hand to soften the asperities with which this world's conflicts will harden the downiest pillow; no kindred heart in whose sympathetic throbbings he could read the alphabet of love. He seemed like an eagle, perched alone upon a blasted oak in sullen and defiant majesty, scorning alike the chatter and the scream of other birds around him; his eye sometimes seemingly covered with film as of down from the passing wing of death, but in a moment shooting into pinions on which he proudly soared to the sun.

That proud and defiant spirit, often fierce, sometimes unforgiving, and always bold and honest, has passed away. Is it presumption to hope that beneath all his outward apparent harshness there was an undercurrent of benevolence; that the thunder-cloud which hung upon his rugged brow and from beneath which flashed the lightning of his sunken eye, melted into the rainbow of hope and the light of love, and that the closing scenes of his life, the holy influence, pure prayers, and sacred rites of the pious sisters, to whom both here and at Emmitsburg, in Maryland, he had shown many favors, and who repaid him tenfold in the deep devotion of their unselfish love, as they wafted his departing spirit to the gates of Heaven on their trembling petition, and closed his eyes in death; with the blessing of the venerable octogenarian priest of Lancaster, still living, who loved and honored him through life, cleansed his soul from sin, and that his spirit was admitted to the mansions of the blest?

But, Mr. Speaker, I am apparently forgetting that I turned my footsteps only for a moment with this sad procession, not to deliver any eulogy or to recall his frailties. I rose simply to fling upon his passing bier a flower—would that it were worthier—a daisy or a shamrock, wet with the dew-drop of a sincere and sympathizing tear; and join in the prayer which thousands waft to Heaven to-day that his spirit may rest in eternal peace.

Mr. SYPHER. Mr. Speaker, the character of Mr. STEVENS in his relations as a fellow-townsmen has been most ably and appropriately commented on by the gentleman from Pennsylvania who succeeds him in this House. His distinguished services in the State of his adoption, both in the cause of common schools and the construction of public works, may with just propriety be cited as among the most honorable achievements of his life. I pass over the period given to fostering and building up the institutions of the great Commonwealth which he so highly honored and come immediately to lay upon the grave of this great champion of freedom the grateful thanks of an emancipated race, of a disenthralled people, and of States regenerated. It is not unnatural that the loyal constituency of myself and colleagues on this floor from the South should have regarded Mr. STEVENS as the foremost as well as the most earnest and trustworthy defender of their rights. These people have ever been in the peculiar situation of living within the lines of the enemy, and, therefore, during all their days of hope and nights of despair, looking northward for deliverance, the stalwart form of him who always led the advance guard, and who never retired behind the picket line, was ever most prominently in view.

THADDEUS STEVENS was born a leader. Men, policies, and parties were not allowed to stand in his way. His life was devoted to the cause of humanity, and whatever race or individual wrongfully oppressed strove to rise above the oppressor, found in him a true and faithful friend and able advocate.

Thirty years' active participation in the anti-slavery movement in this country and a thorough analysis of the character of the slaveholder had fully prepared him to enter into an armed struggle against treason and traitors. He had no sympathy with peace conferences, compromises, and resolutions of pacification. In the autumn of 1860 he wrote to a young man then in Memphis, Tennessee, "The only way to end this rebellion is to conquer the rebels." From the first hour when secession was proclaimed in South Carolina and the property of the nation was seized by southern rebels his voice was for war. In State and in national council, in his place on the floor of this House, in private conferences with the President and the Cabinet, he advocated a vigorous prosecution of the war on war principles. His propositions were so bold that timid men were startled and stood fixed in amazement. Before the sound of the first gun fired in the cause of treason and rebellion had reached the northern border of the Republic he declared that freedom should be proclaimed to every slave in the land, and the loyal men of the South, both white and black, should be invited to enroll themselves in defense of the Union. He maintained that public safety demanded nothing less. The brave old man would have called a million of men into service and would have marched amid the clash of steel and the roar of artillery from the Potomac to the Gulf.

Thus he would have swept treason before him, and behind him he would have left an unquestionable guarantee of perfect equality of rights before the law. In the spring of 1862 he declared upon this floor in favor of immediate emancipation. President Lincoln plainly and emphatically expressed his disapprobation of this measure, and avowed that the Administration was not in sympathy with that movement. Late in the summer, after the nation had been disciplined by the failure of the peninsular campaign, President Lincoln turned to the speech in which this great and wise measure was advocated. He sent for Mr. STEVENS, apologized for the opposition made to him, and declared himself in favor of emancipation. These two great men of the nation were agreed as to the fact, but differed as to time. STEVENS favored immediate emancipation; Lincoln thought best to give the rebels due notice that they would lose their slaves if they did not lay down their arms. Fortunately, thrice fortunate for the nation and especially for my constituents, the God of nations hardened the hearts of the enemy and they did not cease to make war, and therefore, at the expiration of one hundred days, came the proclamation of freedom that STEVENS would have issued three hundred days before.

Following the emancipation came the struggle on the question of arming the colored men of the South who had just obtained the right of self-ownership. STEVENS again boldly advanced to the picket-line and lashed his tardy compeers up to the duty of self-preservation. When the last terrible blow had crushed armed rebellion, the work of the soldier ended, and that of the statesman began, then the doctrine of universal amnesty was promulgated from the highest places in the nation; it was preached from the pulpit; it was recommended in Cabinet; it was advocated in the most powerful journals in the land. In the mighty struggle that followed, wherein all that had been won by force of arms was about to be sacrificed by the sophistry of diplomacy, STEVENS was again the bulwark of the nation, almost the sole defender of the rights of the loyal millions of the southern States. But for his services in the work of reconstruction a whole race of people, upon whom the first rays of the light of freedom had just dawned, would have been surrendered unconditionally into the hands of the enemy.

Step by step he fought his way up, dragging the nation after him, until he attained, by the aid of many able and brave associates in Congress, the organization and establishment of governments in the rebellious States upon the basis of a loyal citizenship and perfect equality of rights. In this final labor of his life, when victory dawned upon the nation, the heroic old man died at his post beckoning the people forward to higher and nobler achievements. Never will the services of this great man be duly appreciated by those in the defense of whose rights he so manfully struggled. His name, with that of Lincoln, will ever be remembered with the warmest emotions of gratitude by this and succeeding generations of the emancipated people of America, when others now esteemed great shall have been forgotten. He needs no statue of bronze, no pillar of marble with carved inscriptions to tell posterity his fame. The labors and achievements of his life have rendered him immortal. In the name of the loyal South, whose fertile fields have been opened to free and skilled labor; in the name of toiling millions seeking homesteads; in the name of States now no longer cursed by slavery; in the name of a people struggling from abject slavery up to perfect freedom; in the name of a race once declared possessed of no rights which white men were bound to respect, but now clothed with the full rights of citizenship which the whole power of the nation is pledged to defend, I thank God that THADDEUS STEVENS lived and labored and triumphed.

Mr. WHITTEMORE. I cannot expect, nor do I endeavor, to excel the words so "fitly spoken," eulogistic of the life, character, influence, and worth of "the great commoner," whose name has dwelt so often upon the lips of the whole people, whose words and works have become a part of the history of our national greatness, whose good and generous heart beat in sympathy for all humanity, whose every effort was inspired for the elevation, improvement, and prosperity of the race; but I can express somewhat the grief which the people of my State, in common with our whole country, have felt in the loss of him who was the friend of all men, who loved his neighbor as himself, who was an invincible pioneer in all the noble measures which have become the security of our hopes and the ark of safety of our national unity. The emancipated, the enfranchised, the reconstructed, the restored States, the millions redeemed from the house of bondage, once chattels, now freemen, with their title-deeds of citizenship guaranteed, who owe so much to his untiring efforts in their behalf, his uncompromising fidelity to the right, felt in his loss that a peer of Abraham Lincoln had fallen; and in their memories will ever live sacred associations clustering around the counsels he has given, the hope and courage he has inspired, the glorious fruition of his life-long wish and labor. In the homes of the lowly, in the hearts of the emancipated, he has been enshrined.

When the sad news of the death of THADDEUS STEVENS reached my State the General Assembly of South Carolina passed appropriate resolutions and draped her legislative halls in the semblances of mourning. Throughout the Commonwealth expressions of sorrow upon countenance and lip were the true exponents of the solemn bereavement that had been visited upon the nation. South Carolina, with her sisters, restored to her place in the councils of the Republic by his persistent endeavor and patriotic labor, weeps for the mighty dead, thanking the Giver of all good for the examples of his life, the sterling honesty of his nature, and unflinching devotion to right, justice, and truth.

I saw him, when he was yet among us at the close of the session in July, weak in body, true to the last, at his post, yet powerful in mind. Upon informing him of the results which had been accomplished in South Carolina through the policies he had so unceasingly advocated and triumphantly secured he said to me, "Go on, sir; never fear to do right." I shall ever remember his, to me, last words. His voice will ever be heard inspiring me in the future of my life toil, my private and public responsibilities.

Let the exhortation of the nations, "well done, good and faithful servant," influence us in all the legislation before us which he may have left unfinished, to be true to our God, our country, ourselves, and our fellow-men.

Mr. COVODE. I cannot hope to add anything to the mournful interest of this occasion, or to contribute to a true appreciation of the character, services, and merits of Mr. STEVENS; but my intimacy with him was so close and long continued, my admiration for him so sincere and thorough, and my sorrow at his death so deep, that I feel constrained to offer a humble tribute to his memory.

The beginning of his public career antedates most of the men now active in the politics of Pennsylvania, and his career was stormy, eventful, and remarkable, for it covered more than forty years of ceaseless activity. Few men have ever aroused so intense feeling; his friends were drawn to him by an irresistible fascination, and were bound to him by the indissoluble tie of admiration and love. His enemies were ever repelled by the undaunted, almost haughty manner in which he met their advances. By nature a thorough, logical, and consistent radical, he cordially spurned every species of compromise, and he utterly condemned that truckling policy which so generally bartered solid principle for temporary advantage. He despised every form of time-serving, and was absolutely scornful in his contempt for tricksters. His path was ever straight to the goal of his ambition over every obstacle and hindrance. He never deviated in his faith or his purpose, save when a modification of means might hasten and insure the accomplishment of his purpose. He was loftily and heroically devoted to the ideas which possessed him, grandly true to the great thoughts which filled and animated his noble soul. He was a sincere lover of mankind, a keen sympathiser with poverty, an honest hater of injustice, a friend of the downtrodden, and faithful fighter for the rights of all men to freedom, protection, and security. This was the key-note of his public career, and the path he trod is illustrated all along with proofs of his fidelity to those principles which were early implanted and which quickly ripened into animating motives.

In his private relations he was eminently large-hearted. He was a truthful man, an honorable man, a thoroughly manly man. His charity was as extensive as his knowledge of suffering, and was princely in its liberality. He was in his personal relations kindly, affectionate, tender, and winning. No man excelled him in the brilliancy of his conversation, none left his presence unimpressed by his ever-active sympathies. The devotion to his mother of this lion-hearted man was at once a proof and an illustration of his capacity for the deepest and tenderest feeling. Absorbed most of his life in the keen pursuits of politics, some hardening of the nature might naturally have been expected, for none but those who knew him in closest intimacy knew how his weary heart yearned for loving objects to rest upon.

But he has gone. Whatever we may have felt in life we all now realize how large a space he filled, how sagacious and true he was, how nobly and unselfishly devoted to his country, how sedulously careful he was to guard it from prospective dangers, and how comprehensively he realized what measures were necessary to give the country security for the future. Let us go forward in the policy he traced, fortify the buttresses of the nation, and let the Republic, thoroughly reconstructed upon the principles of the Declaration of Independence, and thereby dedicated to immortal life, be worthily his ever enduring monument.

The resolutions were unanimously adopted; and thereupon (at four o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, December 18, 1868.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

On motion of Mr. GRIMES, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented resolutions adopted at a meeting of the Detroit Manufacturers' Association, in favor of so amending the national banking act as to make it a free banking law, and extending the privileges of the system to meet the requirements of the country and a reduction of the interest on the national debt; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HOWE presented a petition of citizens of the United States, praying for a repeal of so much of sections seventy-eight and ninety-four of the act entitled "An act imposing taxes on distilled spirits and tobacco, and for other purposes," as relates to the tax on tobacco manufactured after the passage of the act, and that the Department furnish stamps, free of charge, for all tobacco, snuff, and cigars manufactured previous or subsequent to the passage of the law; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the memorial of the Mercantile Mutual Insurance Company of New York, asking for the use of certain legal-tender notes instead of others destroyed in the United States mails; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. STEWART. I present the memorial of Charles Weile, setting forth certain outrages committed upon him by the citizens of Tumbes, in Peru, while he was acting as United States consul there, and asking that they may be investigated. This appears to be a very hard case. The people of that city treated him very roughly. I do not know what action can be taken on the subject, but I will ask the Committee on Foreign Relations to examine the question, and if need be refer it to the State Department. There ought to be something done about it. We have a large number of our whalers that go there. This gentleman is from my State. He is a very worthy man, a man who was trying to do his duty as consul at this place. There is a state of anarchy there, and they mobbed him, and treated him very roughly. It ought to be regulated in some way. There ought to be some redress. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN presented the petition of M. E. Black and others, of Iowa, praying for the establishment of a daily mail route from Casey, on the Chicago, Rock Island, and Pacific railroad, to Fontanelle, Iowa county, and thence to Queen City, Iowa; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. WILSON presented a petition of late soldiers of the volunteer army, praying for a repeal of a part of section seven of an act to establish a national asylum for disabled soldiers which gives the managers of the asylum the power to stop the pensions of certain inmates for the benefit of the asylum; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of Simeon Putnam, of Chelsea, Massachusetts, praying that the Constitution be so amended as to have the President and Vice President elected by a direct vote of the people; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MORTON presented a memorial of certain Miami Indians, of the State of Indiana, in relation to the payment of annuities to the Miami Indians of Indiana; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented a memorial of the Indiana yearly meeting of Friends, praying for the confirmation of a certain piece of land granted to them by the Shawnee Indians for school purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. ABBOTT presented a petition of citizens of North Carolina, praying that provision be made for the payment of claims of loyal citizens; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HENDRICKS presented the petition of A. W. Smith, of Virginia, praying for the removal of the political disabilities imposed on him by acts of Congress; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WILLEY presented the petition of William H. Ragan, of Montgomery county, Virginia, praying for a removal of the political disabilities imposed on him by acts of Congress; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the petition of James M. Wade, of Montgomery county, Virginia, praying for a removal of the political disabilities imposed on him by acts of Congress; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. NYE presented the petition of Charles Weile, praying for compensation for services rendered as consul at Tumbes, Peru; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. VICKERS presented the petition of Mrs. Philip Johnson, praying for the passage of a law to compel landlords to comply with their leases; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee, presented additional papers relating to the claim of Paulina Jones, for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. CRAGIN, it was Ordered, That the papers of McKean Buchanan, a purser in the Navy, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CHANDLER. If there are no further memorials I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1460.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the Senator from Michigan will allow me to submit a motion for a short executive session, which it is necessary to have before the anticipated message is received from the House of Representatives. The message may come in at any moment, and therefore I trust he will give way for a short executive session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan moves to proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him. The motion can only be entertained by unanimous consent during the reception of the morning business.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to make some reports first.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If it is objected to the motion cannot be entertained until the morning business is disposed of. Reports of committees are in order.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. TRUMBULL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the following resolutions and petition, asked to be discharged from their further consideration, and that they be indefinitely postponed; which was agreed to:

Resolutions by Mr. SUMNER, declaring certain further guarantees required in the reconstruction of the rebel States;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 183) to extend the provisions of the act of July 4, 1864, limiting the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims to the loyal citizens of the States of Louisiana and Arkansas; and

A petition of S. C. Mayberry, praying for the passage of a law providing for the election of President and Vice President of the United States by ballot.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 657) to abolish the franking privilege, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 186) declaratory and amendatory of the act entitled "An act to provide for an American line of mail and emigrant passenger steamships between New York and one or more European ports," passed July 27, 1868, reported it with amendments.

Mr. FERRY, from the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 704) to extend the letters-patent originally granted to John Young, reported it without amendment.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MORTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 706) in relation to a site for an Executive Mansion; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. MORTON. I wish to state that I present this bill by request, and do not know myself anything in regard to the merits of the proposition. I move its reference to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and that it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 707) granting lands to the State of Wisconsin to aid in the construction of a breakwater and harbor and ship-canal at the head of Sturgeon bay, in the county of Door, in said State, to connect the waters of Green bay and Lake Michigan, in said State; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. EDMUNDS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 708) to repeal so much of the act passed June 25, 1868, as provides for the admission of the State of Georgia to representation in Congress, and to provide for a provisional government therein, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILLIAMS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 709) to provide for the better administration of justice in the Territories of the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ABBOTT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 710) to provide for the payment of claims to loyal citizens of the States lately in rebellion; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

BILL RECOMMENDED.

Mr. SAWYER. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to call up the bill (H. R. No. 907) to provide for the sale of certain lands and lots on the sea islands of Beaufort district, South Carolina, and for other purposes, which was reported from the Committee on Public Lands, with an amendment, on the 20th of July last, for the purpose of moving a recommitment of it to the committee.

The motion to take up the bill was agreed to.

Mr. SAWYER. Now I move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is necessary to have a short executive session before the message which is expected is received from the House of Representatives. That motion is always in order. I therefore move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. It will take but a few moments.

Mr. HARLAN. Before that motion is put I desire to inquire whether that will cut off the morning business?

Mr. SHERMAN. Not at all. It is always in order during the morning hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened.

DUTIES ON IMPORTED COPPER.

Mr. CHANDLER. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill (H. R. No. 1460) regulating the duties on imported copper and copper ores.

Mr. FERRY. I hope the Senator will not insist upon that bill being taken up at the present time. One of the Senators from Maryland, not now in his seat, [Mr. WAYTE,] I am informed is interested in the bill on behalf of a very heavy interest in his immediate constituency, which is seriously affected by the operations of the bill. I desire myself, whenever the bill shall be under consideration in the Senate, to present some statistics and facts, which I have been unable as yet to collect fully, in opposition to the bill. The bill, I would state for the information of such Senators as are not aware of its history, was reported to the House of Representatives on the first day of this session, and immediately, without any explanation, under the operation of the previous question passed the House. It did not at that time attract my attention, until it came into the Senate. It was referred to the Finance Committee, and has been by them, within two or three days last past, reported to the Senate. It is a bill affecting very large and varied interests, not only manufacturing, but commercial, and affecting them, in the belief of those engaged in them, most disastrously. I do not wish to say anything now in regard to the details of the bill; but having these considerations to suggest, and statistics which I am now engaged in collecting to present to the Senate, I hope it will not be pressed upon our consideration at the present time.

Mr. CHANDLER. This bill was reported and was before the House of Representatives and thoroughly discussed at the last session of Congress. They were calling the yeas and nays upon it when the House adjourned. When the hammer fell they had proceeded half way through the roll-call. It is the same bill, verbatim, that was thoroughly discussed here two winters ago and passed by this body. It has received, perhaps, more consideration than any other bill before either House of Congress. It passed the House of Representatives by a vote of more than two to one. It is a matter of vital importance to a very large class of people, not only in the State of Michigan, but in other States. The copper interests of the Lake Superior region are almost ruined. They have been running at a loss for the last two years hoping that this identical bill would pass. As I said before, the Senate did act upon it two years ago after thorough discussion and passed it precisely, verbatim, as it is in this bill. It was thoroughly discussed in the other House during the last session, and after a full discussion it passed that House by a vote of two to one. I hope the Senate will proceed to its consideration.

Mr. SUMNER. I shall not say anything against the bill which the Senator has in charge, but I must ask that its consideration shall not be proceeded with to-day. I have some amendments to propose to it. I had them here yesterday, ready, if the bill were proceeded with then, to present them. I carried them home with me last night, not expecting that this bill could be proceeded with to-day. I understood that this day was set apart to another object. I am not, therefore, prepared to proceed with the consideration of this bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it is perhaps due to the Senate that I should state the circumstances connected with this bill. I feel bound to do it, as I reported the bill. The bill came to the Committee on Finance, and we are in favor of it. I believe it fixes the same rates that were imposed by the tariff bill two years ago. The chief objection of the committee, however, to the bill was, not as to the rates—they are the same that have been passed two or three times by the Senate—but as to detaching this interest from other interests and passing it as a separate bill; and the committee at one time concluded that it was not advisable at present to report the bill, but afterward changed their decision. I make this remark simply for the reason that after the first action of the committee I informed the parties who took an interest in the bill that the bill would probably not be reported until after the holidays. The committee, however, thought afterward that it was better to report the bill; but now I am not disposed to vote to crowd it upon the Senate until after the holidays, so as to give parties who have interests against it an opportunity to examine it and oppose it if they choose. I am in favor of the bill, and shall vote for its passage. I think the rates proposed are not too high. They are about twenty per cent. on the gold value of the copper—the same rates that were agreed upon in the revision of the tariff two years ago. I think myself the Senator from Michigan had better not press the bill now, because I know there are various motions in the form of amendments that will be offered that will lead to more or less debate here, and but a few moments will elapse before we shall be called to another duty.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am exceedingly anxious to pass this bill before we adjourn for the holidays; but as the Senator from Massachusetts says he has amendments prepared which he desires to offer of course I shall not press it now.

Mr. SUMNER. My amendments will not interfere with the bill at all.

Mr. CHANDLER. I therefore give notice that I shall call it up to-morrow morning and try to have a vote upon it. It is really a matter of too much importance to the State which I have the honor in part to represent and to other States to let it go by. I will state that the mining arrangements are usually made before or on the 1st of January, and it is very important for those interests that they should know what is to be their fate on or before that day, and I shall ask the Senate to-morrow to proceed with the bill to a final vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator withdraw his motion to take it up?

Mr. CHANDLER. Yes, sir, I withdraw it; but I give notice that I shall renew it to-morrow morning.

RECENT INDIAN BATTLE.

Mr. HARLAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to send to the Senate any information in the possession of the Department in relation to the hostile or peaceful character of the Indians recently killed or captured by the United States troops under the command of Colonel George A. Custar; and to inform the Senate whether said Indians were at the time of said conflict residing on the reservation assigned them under treaty stipulations; and if so, whether they had taken up said residence in pursuance of instructions emanating from the Department of the Interior.

PAYMENT OF PUBLIC DEBT IN COIN.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish to call up joint resolution No. 66, merely for the purpose of submitting an amendment to it. For that purpose I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. No. 66) pledging the faith of the United States to the payment of the public debt in coin or its equivalent.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. I now offer my amendment, and I ask to have it read and printed.

The amendment was read. It proposes to strike out the preamble, and all of the resolution after the word "that," in the third line, and to insert:

The equitable and true liability of the United States upon their bonds is the value in gold and silver coin of what was received upon the sale of those bonds; and the amount of that value, with a fair rate of interest upon it, ought to be paid to the bondholders in coin; that the expenses and disbursements of the Government should be reduced to this scale: for the civil service, $40,000,000; pensions and Indians, $30,000,000; the War Department, $25,000,000; Navy Department, $20,000,000; miscellaneous and contingencies, $10,000,000; and interest upon the public debt, $50,000,000; that the existing aggregate amount of taxes upon the people should be reduced $100,000,000 annually; and that a reasonably early day should be fixed for the resumption of specie payments.

The amendment was ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAVIS. I now move that the joint resolution lie on the table for the present.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HARLAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 712) to provide for the appointment of recorder of deeds and warden of the jail in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

METROPOLITAN RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. HARLAN asked; and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 711) relating to the Metropolitan Railroad Company.

Mr. HARLAN. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the bill was read three times and passed. It proposes to allow the Metropolitan Railroad Company, in the District of Columbia, five years from and after the passage of the act for the completion of its lines of street railways authorized by the acts of July 1, 1864, and March 3, 1865.

POLITICAL DISABILITIES IN ALABAMA.

Mr. SPENCER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Whereas the bill removing the political disabilities of certain citizens of Alabama therein named was passed by the Congress of the United States before the amendment to the fourteenth article of the Constitution was ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the States, including both rebel and loyal: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Judiciary Committee be requested to inquire and report to the Senate, at its earliest convenience, whether said bill removed the political disabilities of said persons which were imposed upon them by the said amendment to the fourteenth article of the Constitution, or those political disabilities which were imposed upon them by the reconstruction acts.

STATIONERY PAGE.

Mr. RAMSEY submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the page in the stationery-room of the Senate receive the same compensation per diem as the pages on the floor of the Senate, to date from January 1, 1863.

SYMPATHY TO SPAIN.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution relating to Spain, which was under consideration yesterday.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. No. 178) tendering sympathy and best wishes to the people of Spain, the pending question being on the amendment reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I ask that the resolution be read as it now stands amended.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as amended, as follows:

That the people of the United States, sympathizing with the people of Spain in their effort to establish a more liberal form of government, express the confident hope that it will be conducted to the end in such way as to promote the triumph of liberal institutions; and they earnestly appeal to the people of Spain not to allow the present opportunity to pass without securing the immediate emancipation of slaves and the final abolition of slavery throughout the Spanish dominions.

Sec. 2. And be it further resolved, That the President of the United States is charged with the duty of communicating this resolution to the Government of Spain.

Mr. DAVIS. I shall vote against the resolution in the form in which it has been read. I have contemplated with a great deal of interest the movement lately inaugurated in Spain in behalf of liberal institutions against a monarchical form of government. I think the movement has been characterized by singular moderation, judgment, and patriotism; but I have no idea that we should recommend to the people of Spain, or any other people whatever, what should be their particular institutions and what should be their internal policy upon any subject. The people of every country, if they have virtue and intelligence enough to form liberal and popular institutions, are the best judges of the particular form of government they should adopt, and of the internal policy which should accompany that government. It is a piece of officious interference on the part of the Congress of the United States to offer to volunteer its advice in relation to those matters. It is time enough for us to offer our wise counsels to Spain in relation to some particular subjects embraced in the resolution when we are asked for that advice. But, sir, there is no greater breach of friendship than for one man or one nation to be volunteering officiously and impertinently with advice in relation to the concerns of other men and other nations.

I hope it is the purpose of the people of Spain to establish a republican form of government and popular government. I should be gratified myself if the people of Spain would take it into their heads to emancipate their slaves. But in relation to these particular matters it seems to me that the people of Spain are the best and the exclusive judges of what befits best their own interests and condition, and that it is officiousness upon the part of the Congress of the United States of America to offer its counsels to them. I shall therefore vote against the resolution in its present form.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and was read the third time.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, there is a piece of good advice given somewhere—I have seen it in the course of my reading—to this effect: "Physician, heal thyself." If such a communication should be sent back to the American Government by Spain in response to this resolution, I think it would be as apt and as just as one as could under any circumstances be sent. We have a vast territory now, twice as large as Spain, where our love of liberty and just and wise institutions is being daily illustrated, and I hope it is not meant to commend the example which we have set in that section of country for the imitation of the Spanish Government. But as I see, there is a communication from the House of Representatives awaiting delivery, I will not say anything further now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the joint resolution, and upon that question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question, being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 41, nays 5; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Corbett, Dixon, Drake, Ferry, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Harlan, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Nye, Osborn, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Pool, Ramsey, Rice, Robertson, Ross, Sawyer, Sherman, Spenger, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Warner, Williams, and Wilson—41.

NAYS—Messrs. Davis, McCreery, Saulsbury, Vickers, and Whyte—5.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Buckalew, Conkling, Connors, Cragin, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fowler, Harris, Hendricks, Kellogg, McDonald, Morton, Norton, Pomeroy, Tipton, Welch, Willey, and Yates—20.

So the joint resolution was passed. The title was amended by striking out the words "and best wishes," so as to read, "A joint resolution tendering sympathy to the people of Spain."

DEATH OF HON. THADDEUS STEVENS.

Mr. McPHERSON, Clerk of the House of Representatives, appeared below the bar and announced that he was directed to communicate to the Senate the resolutions adopted by the House of Representatives on the announcement of the death of Hon. THADDEUS STEVENS, late a member of the House from the State of Pennsylvania.

The resolutions of the House of Representatives were read.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, it is my sad duty to announce to the Senate the death of that eminent statesman, THADDEUS STEVENS, a member of the House of Representatives from Pennsylvania. This great man died at midnight on the 11th of August last, at his residence in this city, during the recess of Congress.

THADDEUS STEVENS was born on the 4th of April, 1792, at Danville, in Vermont, where he received his primary education. He afterward went to Burlington and Dartmouth, where he completed that portion of his education which the schools can confer. After leaving college he followed the American instinct to move westward; and so came to Pennsylvania, residing first at York, afterward removing to Gettysburg, and finally settling at Lancaster. His adopted State received him in a different spirit from that with which many States now receive men of talent, energy, and ability; and the veneration in which his public character is held in Pennsylvania is a fitting rebuke to the stupid bigotry which repels such material.

Shortly after his arrival in York, Mr. STEVENS, at the age of twenty-two, began the study of the law, teaching a school in the mean time to maintain himself while prosecuting his studies. Born and reared in the free mountains of Vermont, where slavery was a tradition merely, and coming to the Maryland border, where its effects could be seen in the fence-corners, it was natural for a man of THADDEUS STEVENS's sturdy and combative nature to detest that institution. It was impossible that he could uphold or quietly tolerate so unjust a system. He became an anti-slavery man, of course; and it is questionable if so uncompromising a foe to slavery or an abler one ever lived in America. He was a powerful defender and a terrible opponent; and it may be justly said of him that he was more successful in sustaining than in originating measures, more powerful to overthrow than to build up institutions.

After his admission to the bar he rose steadily until he reached a leading place in his profession; and he maintained this conspicuous position until he ceased the active practice of the law. His intellectual grandeur always commanded admiration. He was always thorough. His conduct of a case in the petty sessions was not unlike his management of a great debate on questions affecting the deepest interests of mankind. Without wasting his own force or wearing out the patience of his auditory, he went directly to the core of the subject in hand. Never dissipating his thought over a great variety of points, he fastened upon those most important and essential, and pressed these home with resistless vigor, logic, eloquence, and wit; and from the time of his entry into public life no man assailed him without danger or conquered him without scars. He retained his mental vigor to the last, and with his eye undimmed by age he has passed from the scenes of a busy and a useful life full of years and of honors.

In 1833 Mr. STEVENS was elected to the Legislature of Pennsylvania, and at once took a prominent part in the deliberations of that body. His most signal service was the defense of our common-school system from the attacks of its enemies. A system of public education had been provided for in Penn's frame of government for the province, by the provisional government framed after the Declaration of Independence, and by the constitution of 1790. By virtue of this authority the provincial council organized a school in Philadelphia on October 26, 1683, the date of Penn's charter being April 25, 1682. Other schools were instituted as they became necessary. In 1752 an effort was made to provide for a comprehensive system of public instruction; but the colonial wars first and the Revolution afterward frustrated this wise design. But public opinion was never wholly diverted from this scheme. All the Governors of our State under the constitution, I think, pressed the importance of this great measure of the Legislature, and none with greater force and pertinacity than Governors Snyder, Shultz, and Wolf, three representatives of that good and too often neglected German element in the population of Pennsylvania.

Until the year 1834 our public schools suffered from a radical defect. They only provided for the education of the poor gratis. The advancing intelligence of the age demanded a more enlightened policy. A committee of the two Houses of our Legislature, containing, among others, Dr. Samuel Breck, James Thompson, and Wilmer Worthington, of West Chester, framed the law of 1834, the foundation of our admirable school system. The first-named of these gentlemen has passed away, but his then youthful colleagues still live to enjoy the lasting honors in which their fellow-citizens hold their services in the cause of education. Hon. James Thompson now adorns our supreme bench, and Hon. Wilmer Worthington is the speaker of the senate of Pennsylvania.

The change from the "pauper" system—as it was called—to one of general education impressed many with a belief that the additional burdens of taxation consequent on such a change would prove too onerous, and a furious opposition to the law of 1834 arose in some parts of the State. In 1835 this feeling had gained such strength that there was danger that the law would be repealed, in obedience to the popular clamor. But this noble act had a noble refuge. Governor Wolf had determined to veto any legislation which attempted its repeal. When the contest came THADDEUS STEVENS defended the school law with great power, and the repealing act was defeated by a large majority. To the honor of Mr. STEVENS it must be remembered that this popular outcry against the school law gave him the opportunity to gain a signal advantage over his political opponents, but he scorned to use it for such a purpose. The time gained for reflection by the defeat of the repealing act saved our common-school system from annihilation. The general sentiment now restrains opposition to this institution, and the advanced and steadily advancing intelligence of our people stands as the monument to the wise framers of the law of 1834 and its able defender.

The importance of our public improvements was discussed and established in the latter part of the last and the system was inaugurated early in the present century. Its active and successful advocate in the Legislature was William Lehman, of Philadelphia, who entered the Legislature in 1818. Active operations were begun in 1826, and continued under the able direction of Governor Shultz, John Sargent, William Darlington, David Scott, Joseph McIlwaine, Daniel Montgomery, Abner Leacock, James Clarke, Jonathan Knight, Charles Mowry, and Francis R. Shunk, during the twelve years of the administrations of Governors Shultz and Wolf. The works were in full operation in 1835, and in 1838 THADDEUS STEVENS was appointed canal commissioner by Governor Ritner. His success was not equal to his abilities. During his administration of this office additional works were undertaken, but they proved complete failures. Various causes combined to prevent his success. Intense opposition always confronted him, and an impatience of details operated against him in everything of a business character, except in his profession, where he was consummate in his preparation and use of every means of victory.

In referring to the life and public services and character of such a man as THADDEUS STEVENS it is unbecoming to indulge in loose statement and bombastic praise. There is enough of the man to furnish materials for a truthful and an honorable encomium without claiming for him exclusively honors which mainly belong to his contemporaries. This should be especially avoided in the case of Mr. STEVENS, for no man more thoroughly despised such injustice. He always resented being dressed in borrowed robes. An observance of this rule would doubtless have prevented injudicious admirers from claiming for Mr. STEVENS the paternity of our common-school system, and our system of public works. Eulogies of this character, pronounced on the spur of the moment, though inexcusable, are innocent when compared with elaborate obituaries, for it is to these last that historians are most apt to refer. And thus the ungracious task is thrown on some one of correcting errors and misstatements which should never have been made.

In 1836 Mr. STEVENS was chosen a member of the convention to amend the constitution of Pennsylvania, and here, as everywhere else, he displayed high ability. Under our constitution of 1790 negroes enjoyed the right of suffrage. The aggressions of the slave influence demanded that this right should be stricken down. The besotted majority in the North were everywhere inclined to yield the point. In our convention this feeling actuated the majority of the members, but THADDEUS STEVENS battled with all his might against the outrage. He was overcome. The rights of a portion of our citizens were sacrificed to the prevailing sentiment, and the word "white" was inserted in our constitution as a condition to the right of suffrage. With characteristic independence Mr. STEVENS refused to sign a document containing such an unjust discrimination against peaceable and law-abiding men, and he bravely determined to forego the distinction of having his name go down to posterity on that document. Few young men would have shown the contempt for position which he then exhibited, and fewer can understand that true fame can be found more surely in doing right than in being in conspicuous company.

In 1850 Mr. STEVENS was elected to Congress. His ardent love of liberty and his inextinguishable hatred of American slavery threw him headlong into an opposition to that institution as determined as it seemed hopeless. The sentiment and conscience of the nation was blunted and debauched, and the forlorn hope which THADDEUS STEVENS then led did not suffer themselves to hope for a view of the bright and swiftly coming day which his old eyes were permitted to see in its full glory. Failing to secure a re-nomination, he retired from Congress in 1852, and resumed the practice of the law. His public career seemed to have closed in the very prime of his vigor. But a mighty change was at hand.

In 1854 the slaveholders, unsatisfied with anything short of absolute dominion, shocked the lulled conscience of the nation by attacking and destroying what demagogues called the "settlements" of the slavery question, and what wise men knew to be but a postponement of an inevitable trouble. This high-handed outrage on the vast majority by a numerically contemptible minority produced a revulsion in our politics compared with which all others are insignificant. Old parties melted away. Old thoughts gave way to new vigor. The respectability claimed for the slaveholders was laughed at in the light of their degrading attitude before the astonished country. Their highly extolled honor became a jibe when compared with their Punic faith. New organizations wrested the Legislature from the men who had used it for our disgrace. Old leaders, remembered for their courage and audacity, were recalled. In 1858 THADDEUS STEVENS returned to Congress, and the foremost men of the now powerful Opposition accepted him as their leader.

This crime of the slaveholders culminated in a terrible war that ended in the destruction of the cause which provoked the conflict. During that period of our national trials the history of Mr. STEVENS is inextricably interwoven with the history of his country. Space and propriety alike require that I should leave any elaborate reference to his services during that period to those whom time and freedom from partiality shall enable to do the subject full justice.

Since the death of THADDEUS STEVENS I have been pained to notice the vulgar fury with which his character has been assailed. I had indulged the hope that vituperation had exhausted itself on him during his long life, but I have been mistaken. If malignant and merciless abuse could destroy the usefulness of men the services which Mr. STEVENS has rendered to mankind would have been prevented. Men every way his inferiors set themselves up as critics and censors of his private life. The manner in which they have performed their self-imposed duty shows they never knew, or had forgotten, that the strongest virtue consists in successfully battling against ever-present temptation, and that those who overcome are more to be honored than those who lack the inclination to go astray. We have forgotten the bravery of the Gascon, and only use his name now to describe a braggart. A mere reference to the fact proves the injustice; and the same injustice will be perpetuated if we remember only the caustic sarcasms of the dead statesman and forget his life-long love and devotion to a downtrodden race.

Mr. President, I move the adoption of the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Senate has received with profound sensibility the announcement of the death of Hon. THADDEUS STEVENS, late member of the House of Representatives from the State of Pennsylvania.

Resolved, That from a sincere desire of showing every mark of respect for the memory of Hon. THADDEUS STEVENS, the members and officers of the Senate will go into mourning by the usual mode of wearing crape on the left arm.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect for the memory of Mr. STEVENS, the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, New England has given to Pennsylvania two men of great distinction, though of unequal merit.

In provincial times Franklin came from Boston to Philadelphia, a fugitive youth, and entered upon that career which has been given to the history of the world. As author and publisher, as representative in the Colonial Assembly of Pennsylvania, as member and president of the State constitutional convention of 1776 and chief executive officer in the government established by that convention, as colonial agent in Great Britain, as delegate in the Continental Congress and signer of the Declaration of Independence, as organizer of the postal service in this country under the Confederation, as a scientist and member of learned bodies at home and abroad, and finally, as our illustrious and successful minister at the French court in the dark hours of the Revolution, he is known of all men and his name will go down to future ages. It is the pride of our people to contemplate the colossal reputation which he achieved and left behind him, and they dwell with pleasure upon the minutest particulars concerning him from that hour when, obscure and friendless, he appeared in the city of his adoption to the time when "full of years and full of honors" he passed away to his appointed repose.

THADDEUS STEVENS came from Vermont to Pennsylvania at the age of twenty-one. He came, unheralded and unattended, to carve his way to fortune among strangers.

Adams county, Pennsylvania, lies upon the Maryland border, and Gettysburg is the county town—the seat of justice for the county. At that place Mr. STEVENS settled after a short residence at York, and commenced the practice of the law. It was not a place to make great gains at the bar. The town was not large, the county was not populous, the people were not wealthy. It was a rural section of the State; railroads were unknown, manufactures, except in a small way, had not been established; farmers and shopmen mainly were the clients of men "learned in the laws." But there were sound elements of population in the town and county—the German and Scotch-Irish being prominent—distinguished for industry, frugality, fidelity, and sound sense. And it was a pleasant region, broken but fertile, farm and woodland alternating in the landscape, with hill and mountain in the distance, forest-clothed from base to summit. There were a few scattered villages for the convenience of merchants, blacksmiths, carpenters, and other traders and workmen, and mills sounded along the streams. Cemetery Hill then, as now, overlooked the town of Gettysburg; but no war—at least no war of civilized man—had ever echoed upon its heights, nor had its soil received, as a harvest of battle, the bodies of our patriot dead.

Mr. STEVENS's long residence in a rural district, such as I have described it, influenced in a great degree his subsequent character and conduct. And it gave him a wider knowledge of men and affairs than he could have acquired if he had been at all times the resident of a city. He knew the men of the country as city men cannot know them, and with him always "knowledge was power," and he gave it practical application to the management of men.

Mr. STEVENS entered public life at the ripe age of forty as a Representative in the Pennsylvania Legislature from Adams county. I shall not detail with exactness or at length the facts of his public career; nor shall I pronounce an eulogium upon him or express emotions of personal grief at his removal by death from a field of action and service in which he was conspicuous. His labors will be detailed more fully by others, and his character is one not so much for eulogium as for analysis and for reflection. And as to manifestations of sensibility at this time, I have to say that I think it will be proper to regard somewhat his example upon like occasions and his general views concerning funeral solemnities. He did not respect insincere or undue praise of the dead, and he always refused to wear crape in honor of their memory.

But some notice of his life and character by the two Houses of Congress is most becoming in view of his eminence and of the influence which he exerted upon legislation and upon popular thought. And such notice may be made instructive to men of the present and to men of future times.

The first knowledge I recollect to have acquired of Mr. STEVENS was in 1838. It was from a speech which had been delivered by him in the Legislature of Pennsylvania upon the subject of education. After the lapse of thirty years I can remember that he spoke of the time when "the atoms of creation shall bubble in the crucible of the Almighty," meaning the time of the final destruction of the earth. When I read that I thought, with the taste of a boy, that it was a most eloquent and admirable passage. I do not think so now.

Mr. STEVENS for many years (both within and without the Legislature) conducted or assisted to conduct a war upon the institution of Free-Masonry, and eventually set on foot a legislative investigation of its mysteries. In those years he showed himself to be an able and eloquent leader of party, and obtained for the first time distinction and influence. But his efforts were unsuccessful. Masonry stands as it has stood for ages among the benevolent institutions of civilized States.

Mr. STEVENS contributed some brilliant speeches to the cause of education in Pennsylvania, though his influence in the establishment and support of our common-school system has been somewhat exaggerated.

His service in the canal board of Pennsylvania, to which he was appointed in 1838, provoked much denunciation, particularly as regarded the making and abrogation of contracts upon the public works and the uses of a fund provided for their repair; and his connection with the difficulties at Harrisburg in 1839 provoked still more.

The question in 1839 was one of party power in the Legislature, and it arose upon the election of members from Philadelphia county.

There was a great excitement, and the public peace was imperiled. Troops were brought to Harrisburg, and citizens flocked there in large numbers from all parts of the State. Eventually the difficulty was composed by a recognition of the members really elected, and the disturbance was given to history under the name of the "Buckshot war." I believe there is now but one opinion upon what then took place, and that is that Mr. STEVENS and those who acted with him were entirely wrong, and that an honest decision was reached under the pressure of popular opinion.

Mr. STEVENS was prominently connected with the creation of the public debt of Pennsylvania, as he was with that of the United States. I think that one third of the former was due to his efforts and influence in the passage of appropriations not always well considered or judicious. Struck by the advantages of public works in increasing the general wealth of the State and the prosperity of particular districts, his habit of mind was to overlook particular obstacles and cautious deduction. His imagination kindled in contemplating remote but grand results, and he scorned the reasonings of prudence, and was indifferent to the means by which he wrought. I know it may be said that it is easy now, with results before us, to condemn such improvements as the Gettysburg railroad, the Erie extension, and the Wiconisco feeder, and that the men of 1838 should not be judged in the light of our present information. But I must declare my fixed conviction that the conduct of public men in their appropriations of public money and creation of public debts should be judged by stern rules. They are the trustees of property interests not their own, and their errors and improvidence must not go uncondemned.

Mr. STEVENS was a member of the constitutional reform convention of 1838, but was not an active member during the latter part of its proceedings, nor did he sign the amendments proposed by it for popular adoption, for the reason already stated by my colleague.

I turn, however, from his State to his congressional career. He came into Congress twenty years ago as a Representative from the Lancaster district. After a service of four years he was absent eight, and then, being again returned, was a leading member of the House until his death. These words—a leading member—are not an exaggeration. He led others, and was not led by them; and he had two capital qualifications for mastership in the House. He had a very vigorous will, and he had wit also, which was to him a powerful instrument for both aggressive and defensive debate.

Mr. STEVENS was in the latter part of his career sometimes pleasantly called "the great Commoner;" but this invitation to a comparison between him and Chatham was not well advised. Perhaps it does not deserve serious treatment, but as there is no eminent public man in our political history with whom Mr. STEVENS can be compared—none essentially like him—we may be excused for pausing upon this invited comparison with a foreign statesman of a former age. Pitt, unlike Lord North, was not a man of wit; but his general powers of intellect for parliamentary service were unrivaled. Besides, his abilities were well suited to executive service, as was shown by him when chief minister of the Crown. He united prudence with daring, and was as sagacious as he was bold. Burke has told us of his achievements when he first held the powers of the sovereign and enjoyed the confidence of the Commons; and the subject was worthy the hand of that great master. It is true that points of resemblance may be mentioned between the British statesman and the American leader. Both were men of strong will; both had large influence in representative bodies; both were greedy of applause, though proud, self-sustained, and undemonstrative in its enjoyment; both were leaders of party, but often exhibited independence of party control; both had the great gift of eloquence, though in different manner and in unequal degree. Pitt's elocution was sonorous and commanding, his sentiments lofty, his language, "drawn from the wells of English undefiled," was polished, vigorous, and pure. Besides, he had a moral weight which is sometimes wanting to public men. For he was deeply attached to a lawful spouse, and he respected all those proprieties of private life and of public station which go to make up admired character.

Mr. STEVENS had not a high opinion of men with whom he was brought in contact. His eye was keen to all their defects, and he felt his own mental superiority. This gave him coolness and confidence for debate. Besides, his training at the bar had taught him forensic art and had exercised and strengthened his logical powers. He had the great merit of speaking with directness and of controlling his topics instead of being controlled by them. Therefore he was not tedious, and was always instructive.

Among the measures supported by Mr. STEVENS in Congress was one to regulate the price of gold, or to prevent speculative sales of gold, a measure to which there was but one objection, which was that it undertook to accomplish that which was impossible. It was repealed soon after its passage.

He was early in the war an advocate for the issue of Government notes, and carried through the House the first bill for that purpose. Long afterward he desired to issue $500,000,000 in addition to the great volume of Government currency then in circulation, but did not secure the adoption of his views. He had more confidence than most men in paper money, and denied always the liability of the Government to pay its obligations in coin except where expressly stipulated by contract.

He was sincere and earnest in pursuing his objects and not scrupulous in the use of means for their accomplishment. Party was with him but a means to an end, and he never hesitated to unite with political opponents to secure his purpose. There were many notable instances of this conduct during his service in the House. His impatience with political associates when they differed from him was often strongly manifested; in private discourse without restraint, and in public with emphasis, though with more of decorum. Nor did he withhold himself upon occasion from directing his shafts of satire against particular members of this body.

Upon the conclusion of the war Mr. STEVENS announced his theory of conquest and the policy to be predicated thereon. There was a doctrine of forfeiture involved in the former, which, being written in no code nor illustrated by any American example, was slowly accepted in the counsels of his party and in the debates of Congress. It was that the southern States had forfeited all right to self-government and to their civil institutions by rebellion against Federal authority. Assuming, next, that this Government as conqueror of those States had by virtue of the laws of war complete power over them, the way was opened for propositions of policy concerning them. Gradually his theory prevailed, and many measures founded upon it have been passed and executed. He lived long enough to see his theory accepted and his policy triumphant. In his own party doubters had become resolved, the timid emboldened, the refractory subdued, and all opposition intimidated or silenced. His passions and his will had their complete gratification, except in the two important particulars of confiscation and impeachment. From all this it will appear that he died at a fit time to be canonized as a great and successful leader of party.

Mr. President, for what will men care to remember Mr. STEVENS? He will be remembered for his wit and humor, which were genuine and constant; suited to enliven a dull debate or a tedious trial; to charm a social circle or an occasional companion.

He will be remembered as a lawyer, able, eloquent, and careful; fit for the rough work of a non propter trial or for grave debate in a court of error. Men of the legal profession will hold in memory one who adorned that profession and won its triumphs.

He will be remembered for some generous acts to persons in misfortune; acts magnanimous and noble, which he did not publish abroad, but which have transpired through the gratitude and admiration of others.

He will be remembered as a parliamentary leader; as the man who, beyond any example since Randolph and Clay, gained the ear of the House and held it for many years against all competitors—in all the years of the war and since the war—and resigned his influence only with his life.

Lastly, he will be remembered for his support of emancipation and colored suffrage, great questions which, whatever may be their merits, will be of enduring interest. He projected some and supported all the measures by which they were established and upheld during his life, and left his name to be associated with debate and discourse upon them hereafter.

Sir, men will be apt to forget his imperfections of temper, his defective moral organization, his disregard of proprieties in speech and conduct, his occasional defiance of public opinion, and generally the errors and faults of a lifetime of contest, in contemplating his true and undoubted titles to future fame. If in examining his character I have spoken with freedom and have not withheld the truth which told against him, it has been done in all loyalty to our common manhood and in view of those purposes of instruction with which my task was begun. And thus I leave the subject and the man.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, THADDEUS STEVENS was a native of Vermont, taught and a teacher in her schools, but ultimately a graduate at Dartmouth College, New Hampshire, and removed in his early manhood to Pennsylvania, where for many years he ranked as a well-seasoned politician and something more than a prominent citizen of that flourishing State. Like so many other men of our country, with an experience not discreditable here to proclaim, as it has been and still may be in other lands, he raised himself, unaided by fortune or family, from obscurity to distinction and honor.

It having been my fortune to serve in the House of Representatives, and for some years on the same committee, with Mr. STEVENS, receiving from him uninterrupted courtesy and kindness while long seated in the House by his side, it was impossible to have been unmindful of those characteristics which so often challenged public attention, and it will be excused, perhaps, if I venture to give, however imperfectly, some of the impressions made upon me by a man whose career has been so notable as to secure prominence in the history of a great people and in movements which it may be said, like the traces of glaciers on mountain tops, notch the age.

It is too soon after the storm, and we are too near the waves of contending principles and parties to review the merits of particular acts with which Mr. STEVENS has been more or less identified; and the humbler task will be mine, therefore, of giving an outline picture of the man, or of sketching some of his most distinctive features and traits as they appeared to a near and not uninterested observer.

In the early moments of tenderness and grief for the memory of associates and friends removed from conspicuous spheres of action, plain truth and just discrimination speak in muffled tones, and panegyric alone ventures forth in full voice. Christian charity and the instincts of the human heart would portray only the brighter tints, avoiding shade though of the most veritable sort. But the safety of the public requires that the faults of the statesman shall not be concealed even though the faults of the man receive more generous charity. The disgraceful coalition of Fox with Lord North history still impales, but the personal faults of the former, hereditary or educational, are imputed to the age or charged to Lord Holland, the father. Could we, in the present instance, consult the deceased, as we may by referring to his own example, although he was an unbeliever in the pomp and grief of all congressional eulogies, we should find he would have been unwilling that the sun itself should be represented without its spots; or, if a wart had been on his face he would have objected with Cromwellian sturdiness to its suppression in his picture; and his fate, like that of many other distinguished men,* has been to die leaving no lineal successors, none to feel the joy which well-earned praise bestowed upon an illustrious ancestor inspires, and none to shrink from the touch of impartial justice when the final judgment of posterity is pronounced. But simple justice, even the sharp espionage of criticism, will not dwarf the man. Strike from him a limb, and still something of Hercules will remain.

Beneath a rugged exterior Mr. STEVENS had a heart that loved children, the down-trodden, and the poor; and he could not fail, in spite of differences of policy or of principle, to secure the affection and respect of a multitude of friends; but being at the same time a frank man, who bravely accepted the last link in the chain of his logic; never concealing the rough edge of his judgments upon public measures or public men, and being ever more ready to risk a fall in a wrestle with his foes than to conciliate them by any soft concessions, the muster-roll of his enemies grew almost equally large and formidable.

While the aims of Mr. STEVENS were noble—rarely petty or inconsequential—and his measures, if we do not include his financial idiosyncracies, were almost invariably on the highest planes of morality and philanthropy, or at least of national breadth and gravity; such as the educational system, successfully championed in his adopted State; such as his earnest efforts to secure the largest sum of wages to American workmen through his advocacy of a protective tariff; such as his broad and unstinted support of works of intercommunication from the Atlantic to the Pacific; such as his life-long and persistent hunting down of slavery; yet he cannot be said to have been fastidious, possibly not always over-scrupulous, as to the means used to accomplish the end.

Economy with him rarely rose to the dignity of a great public virtue, as in his estimation it was too cheap and often too nearly allied with demagogism and niggardliness to be treated with constant hospitality. The work of cutting down appropriations was foreign to his taste, and he appeared unhappy when the Government or its officers got less than they asked for. To see the demands of public or private claimants cut short was as painful to him as would have been the sight of bloody surgery. When any measure of great utility, as he understood it, was to be consummated and ordinary means seemed inadequate, then it justified prodigality. Public treasure and public lands were seldom too precious in his eyes to be scattered for objects national in their scope, and he had no apprehensions, not being a jobber himself, that, so scattered, surrounding jobbers might harvest the major part of the future blessings to spring up from such broadcast dispensations. He was an ultra partisan, not, however, of men, nor of parties, but of measures, and he rarely discovered many virtues in men except among those holding coincident and coextensive views and purposes with himself. He was a bold and sometimes a successful party leader.

Popular assemblages, no less than military, revere audacity, and no infirmity, nor age, nor defeat, nor all combined, ever impaired the imperial will or the dauntless courage of this redoubtable leader of the House of Representatives, though he was often confronted by the angriest elements of political antagonism, and sometimes even by the sour and fixed determination of a majority of his own party. It mattered little whether he carried the measures he had in charge upon their own merits—confident that they had merits—or by the swifter enigma of parliamentary tactics, or by a sneer, not less swift and possibly more irrefutable, at some weak argument of an indiscreet opponent. On the road to Jerusalem himself, he did not regard it his fault if others, tugging at the same load, supposed they were on the journey to Rome. At all times equal to debate, the force of "the previous question" was to him no less pertinent. Though equal to argument, the torture of his wit he found equally unmaneuverable and often easier and briefer. For all trimmers he exhibited the fiercest scorn, and his pulverizing and merciless assaults upon opponents inspired his own followers with courage, or they assumed it if they had it not, dreading the rigor with which he drummed out of camp the rear of his own party, or those who, not ambitious to be in advance of public opinion, evinced cowardly and balky symptoms in the closing conflict of the yeas and nays.

Though he aspired to lead and was never an apt follower, nor to be counted upon much as a coadjutor of measures not advised or devised by himself, he was wholly untinctured by vanity, and seemed nearly as oblivious to the praise of friends as to the censure of enemies. Without self conceit and iron-clad against criticism, especially newspaper criticism, he never courted flattery nor counted it as any part of his wages. Envious of nobody, careless of his own reputation, he was wholly satisfied when satisfied with the result, and neither revised his own speeches nor paid much attention to the revised speeches of anybody else. Though deaf himself to personal compliments, he cordially praised and remembered all those who voted rightly, and was an inexorable hater of those who did not or dodged. Rarely wounded in any contest his wounds never bled, but healed without scars, as he had no memory for the blows he provoked and received, still less apology or regret for such as he had given. It may be added that whoever attacked him with such spirit as to show he might be regarded as having been bitten, and not merely barked at, was commiserated as one shortly to appear at some whipping-post, as all knew such attacks were likely to be repaid with vengeance of some sort, and curiosity was on tip-toe to see whether by pungent logic or by a stunning left-handed word charged with an explosive and pitiless sarcasm.

There was a marvellous versatility in his resources both offensive and defensive. When he rose—all unperplexed as to what he should say or by what had been said—none could predict to what weapon from his miscellaneous arsenal he would resort, but whether it proved to be of pagan or Christian temper, of ancient or modern invention, it was likely to be thrust to the quick. He was respectable in pathetic and even eloquent appeals; excellent in the impregnable logic of statement; superb in the indignant flashes of denunciation; unrivaled in repartee; and always at home in rude and burly satire. With much pith and marrow in his discourse he had little of the mere rhetorician, never running out of his way after dainty words nor elaborating graceful sentences, and might have been expected to risk his unsounded capabilities in song with less reluctance than a poetic quotation. Not unfamiliar with the classics, and resorting to them occasionally with felicity, he could yet stoop to sources less refined in order to overwhelm, if not to bedaub, an adversary. He was a chief dreaded by many and admired by more. He could be courtly and dignified in his manner—generally was so—or put on a rough and bantering style amusing to friends but rather terrific to those who were not. General courtesy in debate, however, was his prevailing habit, and toward those who annoyed him most when it might have been presumed that he felt the least inclined to gentleness, he had a knack of loading his manner, by way of irony, with a suavity slightly exaggerated and visible to all save the party thus unconsciously afflicted. He never wearied his hearers by too frequent or too protracted speaking, and was far too sagacious to make a weak or unnecessary speech, or to tender inflated or spurious wit for the genuine coin. But with all his affluence as a debater, his temperament could not restrain some eccentricities of his nature, or slips of the tongue, which exposed him to bitter reproaches as well as friendly regrets. Human grievances and oppressions roused his passions, and when roused he could not be warranted against eruptions of temper as likely to throw stones into the gardens of friends as of enemies. Having a tough and wiry constitution, he bore any amount of fatigue and some excesses with little pain or injury. Punctual in his attendance at the committee-room, not inattentive to a multifarious correspondence, watching with sleepless vigilance all bills on the Calendar, and preparing to mend or maim the leading propositions of every committee, taking part in the daily debates, and though weary at evening from labor and the languor of more than three-score years and ten he yet in the morning, "dreaming he was a boy again," would often have in unexpected readiness a carefully-prepared speech, written in his own rapid, scrawling, thorn-hung style, upon such subjects as he felt to be important and to which he wished to direct the attention of the country; but when he aimed merely to carry the House his speeches were extemporaneous and of marked brevity. Barren of oratorical ostentation, he not only never gave the House a surfeit of himself, but was visibly impatient when others became tedious, silencing all legislative loquacity, if the temper of the House permitted—and of that he was an expert judge—by any parliamentary device within his reach. Weakening no cause by learned length or refinement he yet always appeared to have a reserved force ready to repel unlooked-for attacks from any quarter.

Not always averse to the exhilaration and late hours of a diner-out, nor of jubilant company and occasional diversions anywhere, he was, nevertheless, sure to be at his post when wanted, and seldom lacked luck or vigor in the closing rubber of debate.

Mr. STEVENS was a little lame, having a defect hardly to be concealed—an imperfect foot—similar to that of Scott and Byron, though, unlike the latter, he never attempted its concealment, and being unaccustomed to all borrowed aid consented reluctantly to lean even upon a cane. Like John Quincy Adams and some others, he never required the aid of glasses, for "his eye was not dim, nor his natural force abated."

Having been a life-long bachelor, for years extensively engaged in business as an iron manufacturer, as well as in the practice of the law, whatever may have been his habits of study they were not likely to have been systematic, yet they certainly cannot have been marked by idleness; and his memory, retentive and capacious, enabled him to grasp beyond the learning appropriate to his profession the general store of a scholar, but a scholar without pedantry or nicety, as he grasped general principles with little knowledge of and less taste for minor details. He sought for comprehensive results in the briefest time, and in his devotion to literary and professional reading never could have been a drudge. The quickness of his apprehension, indeed, was so great that he could almost afford to cast off the pain of slow and careful study.

When speaking Mr. STEVENS, notwithstanding his infirmities, stood erect and firmly poised, as if conscious that his foundation reached to the very center of the earth. His strongly cast head, surmounted by a dark and rather ponderous wig, and his stern visage, with brow, eye, mouth, and chin, indicating the "sign and signet of the Almighty to command," all helped to make him a grand and central figure in the House of Representatives; but there was little grace or polish in his periods or gestures—only fire or force or jocularity. An angular and jerky gesticulation, with his lean and bony hands often clenched together, gave point to his words, and he strongly pictured their meaning by the changing moods of his face, which played, whether grave or gay, in gruff harmony with the tone of his voice and argument. His countenance had more the stony features of authority than of sweetness. A beholder would have found it easy to believe him a man of matchless vigor and potent will and not difficult to rank him among the great.

His running undertone commentary upon the debates—sometimes, though rarely, caught up by the reporters—and upon occurrences of the day while in his seat, as well as his occasional talk in the first half hour in the committee-room, was characterized by wisdom and fun mingled and lost in the whirl of business hand in hand with levity. Never, indeed, was wit of all the varieties, coarse and fine, exhibited in more bewildering profusion. Could any Boswell have treasured up all these pithy sallies and ceaseless corruscations, the sportiveness of a genius less sugary than sour and bitter, they might have been found to be surpassed in purity of sentiment or in elegance of phraseology, but surely not in terse severity nor in wealth and heartiness of humor. He daily wasted in this private and semi-grotesque distribution of mirth, sense, and satire, often indiscriminately among friends and foes, a capital sufficient, could it have been preserved, to rival almost any of the acknowledged masters among the colloquial wits of this or possibly of any age. But the gusto with which he let loose his riotous and sparkling fun could not reduce him to the level of a weak and trivial joker, for the reason that he had a depth and seriousness of purpose, a bitterness of resolve, never out of sight, which did not permit him, even in sport, to trifle with the master questions of the day nor with those principles which held indisputable empire over his head and heart.

His wit was all his own, and he had no skill in working ores mined by others, failing even in the common art of story-telling. When his witticisms—and his attempts at wit were rarely failures—were rehearsed in his presence, as would often happen, and when, with the usual fate of such brittle and brilliant wares, they were sadly broken and dimmed by the clumsiness of the retailer, I never knew him to reset the dislocated parts of his jokes or to correct even the baldest blunders; nor did I ever know him to reproduce or to give a new edition of the good things of which he was the constant and prolific author. Born in a jovial moment, often glowing with passion, they were foundlings never after to be nursed by parental solicitude.

Through life he adhered mainly to the same political principles, and no more thought of rattling from his party when unblest by majorities than when in the heyday of its prosperity.

Whenever he stood forth, as he often did, in behalf of some of the immortal principles underlying liberty or human rights, he rarely failed to make conspicuous his full strength, displaying at once the profundity of his convictions and the breadth of his philosophy, the energy of his invective and the flash of his wit, as well as the power and earnestness of his speech. His style was clear, yet abrupt and concise; animated, yet massive; and though lacking idealism, never lacked vigor. Whether he led a conquering majority or a forlorn hope he never watered the truth to make it more popular; but waving the banner of a paramount idea, and self-assured sooner or later of victory, he bid defiance to foes, to time, and fate.

Mr. STEVENS retained his intellectual activity to the end of his days, and could not at the latest moment be persuaded to forego any position, however irksome, to shield himself from labor or responsibility, as if determined "to die like a camel in the wilderness, with his burden on his back." Age brought for him no quietude; success no abatement of his indomitable spirit; and never could it have been truly said of him as of Wilkes, in his old age, that he was "a volcano burnt out." Carried at last to the House of Representatives for months in a chair, he clung to his prerogatives as chairman of committees with as unquenchable tenacity as the Pope of Rome clings to the scepter of secular power. Death came when tired nature itself surrendered. He was released from life at an auspicious moment, when the highest object of his desire—the abolition of American slavery—had been completed; and if he loved life too well to contemplate death with the Christian's faith and joy, he yet was able calmly to appreciate the triumphs of his political philosophy—knowing that at last his country, founded on a rock, was whole and wholly free. The teachings of Socrates and Plato were to him scarcely less inspired than those of the Author of the "Sermon on the Mount," whose doctrines he politically seemed to obey as divine.

We have had but one Franklin, but one John Randolph, and we are not likely to have more than one THADDEUS STEVENS; but the latter, adorned with no title save that of a common Representative of the people, and chiefly after the autumnal age of sixty-five, when men are usually expected to shun both physical and intellectual toil, has won his niche of fame in the Capitol of his country as assuredly as either of the former well-defined but widely different national celebrities.

The practical benevolence of Mr. STEVENS to those in want within his own neighborhood was of that kind which is "not puffed up and vaunteth not itself," nor did it spend its force in a theoretical universality to the practical exclusion of everybody in particular; but the fires which he supplied to many hearthstones of the poor, shielding them from the hard exposures of a rigorous climate, will forever warm the hearts of the recipients, and some tears will bedew the grave of one who declared, (January 13, 1865,) in a brief speech which finely exhibits his robust manner, that he would be satisfied if his epitaph should be written thus:

"Here lies one who never rose to any eminence, and who only courted the low ambition to have it said that he had striven to ameliorate the condition of the poor, the lowly, the down-trodden of every race and language and color."

The memory of Mr. STEVENS will not perish, because he never permitted his humanity to grow old, and because, in spite of any other deductions, he wasted no time in self-seeking displays, but devoted his highest faculties to measures alive with liberty, loyalty, and love of his country.

And yet, Mr. President and Senators, there is no fame more fleeting than that acquired even by veterans in political service. The whole body of congressional debates for any fifty years, after a brief flight of time, will be compressed into a volume not larger than that now required for a single session, and the volume so abridged may, perhaps, "fit readers find though few." Those of us who are in this process to be dropped out, like the bad poems in a revised edition, may reckon it some advantage that we are to be little known. Of all the wan and weary candidates eager for the fame of the political forum few can hope to leave the world so much better than they found it as to secure the perpetual and grateful remembrance of after ages. It is obvious, then, that to become the early prey of oblivion is the doom of nearly all who are led, by the "infirmity of noble minds," to seek reputation through ephemeral services in the field of politics; no registry here on the rolls of fame secures to any name a place in the book of life; and, after all, the highest reward that can await the true patriot, the wisest, and the best—the elevation really to be coveted—is the approval of that Being to whom we are indebted for present life and the hope of such an immortality as will not be dependent upon the frail memory of coming generations, destined to be too busy with their own times to look curiously back upon the personal history of those who will have become almost invisible in the long receding procession of the past.

Mr. SUMNER. The visitor, as he paces the corridor leading to the House of Commons, stops with reverence before the marble statues of the men who, during two centuries of English history, adorned that famous chamber. There are twelve in all, each speaking to the memory as he spoke in life; beginning with the learned Selden and the patriot Hampden, with Falkland so sweet and loyal in character. Somers so great a defender of constitutional liberty, and embracing in the historic group the silver-tongued Murray, the two Pitts, father and son, Fox always first in debate, and that orator whose speeches contribute to the wealth of English literature, Edmund Burke.

In the lapse of time, as our history extends, similar monuments may illustrate the approach to our House of Representatives, arresting the reverence of the visitor. If our group is confined to those whose fame has been won in the House alone, it will be small; for members of the House are mostly birds of passage only perching on their way to another place. Few remain so as to become identified with the House, or their service there is forgotten in the blaze of other service elsewhere, as was the case with Madison, Marshall, Clay, Webster, and Lincoln. It is not difficult to see who will find a place in this small company. There must be a statue of Josiah Quincy, whose series of eloquent speeches is the most complete of our history before Webster pleaded for Greece, and also a statue of Joshua R. Giddings, whose faithful championship of freedom throughout a long and terrible conflict, make him one of the great names of our country. And there must be a statue of THADDEUS STEVENS, who was, perhaps, the most remarkable character identified with the House, unless we except John Quincy Adams; but the fame of the latter is not that of a Representative alone, for he was already illustrious from various service before he entered the House.

All of these hated slavery and labored for its overthrow. On this account they were a mark for obloquy and were generally in a minority. Already compensation has begun. As the cause, which they upheld so bravely, is exalted, so is their fame. By the side of their far-sighted, far-reaching and heroic efforts, how diminutive is all that was done by others at the time! How vile the spirit that raged against them!

STEVENS was a child of New England, as were Quincy and Adams; but, after completing his education, he found a home in Pennsylvania, which had already given birth to Giddings. If this great central State can claim one of these remarkable men by adoption only, it may claim the other by paternity. Their names are among its best glories.

Two things STEVENS did for his adopted State, by which he repaid largely all her hospitality and favor. He taught her to cherish education for the people, and he taught her respect for Human Rights. The latter lesson was slower learned than the former. In the prime of life, when his faculties were in their highest vigor, he became conspicuous for earnest effort, crowned by most persuasive speech, whose echoes have not yet died away, for those common schools, which, more even than railroads, are the hand-maids of civilization, besides being the true support of republican government. His powerful word turned the scale, and a great cause was won. This same powerful word was given promptly and without hesitation to that other cause, suffering then from constant and most cruel outrage. Here he stood always like a pillar. Suffice it to say that he was one of the earliest of abolitionists, accepting the name and bearing the reproach. Not a child in Pennsylvania conning a spelling-book beneath the humble rafters of a village school, who does not owe him gratitude; not a citizen, rejoicing in that security which is found only in liberal institutions, founded on the equal rights of all, who is not his debtor.

When he entered Congress it was as champion. His conclusions were already matured, and he saw his duty plain before him. The English poet foreshadows him when he pictures—

—“one in whom persuasion and belief
Had ripened into faith and faith become A passionate conviction.”

Slavery was wrong and he would not tolerate it. Slave-masters, brimming with slavery, were imperious and lawless. From him they learned to see themselves as others saw them. Strong in his cause and in the consciousness of power, he did not shrink from any encounter, and, when it was joined, he used not only argument and history, but all those other weapons by which a bad cause is exposed to scorn and contempt. Nobody said more in fewer words or gave to language a sharper bite. Speech was with him at times a cat-o'-nine-tails; and wo to the victim on whom the terrible lash descended.

Does any one doubt the justifiableness of such debate? Sarcasm, satire, and ridicule are not given in vain. They have an office to perform in the economies of life. They are faculties to be employed prudently in support of truth and justice. A good cause is helped, if its enemies are driven back; and it cannot be doubted that the supporters of wrong and the procrastinators shrank often before the weapons he wielded. Soft words turn away wrath; but there is a time for strong words as for soft words. Did not the Saviour seize the thongs with which to drive the money-changers from the Temple? Our money-changers long ago planted themselves within our temple. Was it not right to lash them away? Such an exercise of power in a generous cause must not be confounded with that personality of debate which has its origin in nothing higher than irritability, jealousy, or spite. In this sense THADDEUS STEVENS was never personal. No personal thought or motive controlled him. What he said was for his country and mankind.

As the rebellion assumed its gigantic proportions, he saw clearly that it could be smitten only through slavery, and, when after a bloody struggle, it was too tardily vanquished, he saw clearly that there could be no true peace, except by founding the new governments on the equal rights of all. And this policy he urged with a lofty dogmatism, which was as beneficent as uncompromising. The rebels had burned his property in Pennsylvania, and there were weaklings who attributed his conduct to the smart at his loss. How little they understood his nature! Injury provokes and sometimes excuses resentment. But it was not in him to allow a private grief to influence his public conduct. The losses of the iron-master were forgotten in the duties of the statesman. He asked nothing for himself. He did not ask his own rights except as the rights of man.

I know not if he could be called an orator. Perhaps, like Fox, he were better called a debater. And yet I doubt if words were ever delivered with more effect, than when, broken with years and decay, he stood before the Senate, and in the name of the House of Representatives and of all the people of the United States impeached Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, of high crimes and misdemeanors in office. Who can forget his steady, solemn utterance of this great arraignment? The words were few, but they will sound through the ages. The personal triumph in his position at that moment was merged in the historic grandeur of the occasion. For a long time, against opposition of all kinds, against misconceptions of the law and against apologies for transactions without apology, he had insisted on impeachment; and now this old man, tottering to your door, dragged the Chief Magistrate of the Republic to judgment. It was he who did this thing; and I should do poor justice to his life if on this occasion I failed to express my gratitude for the heroic deed. His merit is none the less because other influences prevailed in the end. His example will remain forever.

In the House, which was the scene of his triumphs, I never heard him but once; but I cannot forget the noble eloquence of that brief speech. I was there by accident just as he rose. He did not speak more than ten minutes; but every sentence seemed an oration. With unhesitating plainness he arraigned Pennsylvania for her denial of equal rights to an oppressed race, and rising with the theme, declared that this State had not a republican government. His explicitness was the more striking because he was the Representative of Pennsylvania. I presume the speech will be found in the Globe. Nobody, who has considered with any care what constitutes a republican government, especially since the definition supplied by our Declaration of Independence, can doubt that he was right. His words will live as the courageous testimony of a great character on this important question.

The last object of his life was the establishment of equal rights throughout the whole country by the recognition of the requirement of the Declaration of Independence. I have before me two letters in which he records his convictions, which are, perhaps, more weighty because the result of most careful consideration, when age had furnished experience and tempered the judgment. “I have,” says he, “long and with such ability as I could command reflected upon the subject of the Declaration of Independence, and finally have come to the sincere conclusion that universal suffrage was one of the inalienable rights intended to be embraced in that instrument.” It is difficult to see how there can be hesitation on this point, when the great title-deed expressly says that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed. But this is not the only instance in which he was constrained by the habits of that profession, which he practiced so successfully. A great Parliamentarian of France has said: “The more one is a lawyer the less he is a Senator,” Plus on est avocat moins on est Sénateur. If STEVENS reached his conclusion slowly it was because he had not completely emancipated himself from that technical reasoning, which is the boast of the lawyer rather than of the statesman. The pretension that the power to determine the “qualifications” of voters, embraced the power to exclude for color and that this same power to exclude for color was included in the asserted power of the States to make “regulations” for the elective franchise, seems at first to have deceived him; as if it was not insulting to the reason and shocking to the moral sense, to suppose that any unalterable physical condition, such as color of hair, eyes, or skin, could be a “qualification,” and, as if it was not equally offensive to suppose, that under a power to determine “qualifications” or to make “regulations,” a race could be disfranchised. Of course, this whole pretension is a technicality set up against Human Rights. Nothing can be plainer than that a technicality may be employed in favor of Human Rights, but never against them. STEVENS came to his conclusion at last, and rested in it firmly. It was his final aspiration to see it prevail. He had seen much for which he had striven embodied in the institutions of his country. He had seen slavery abolished. He had seen the freedman lifted to equality of political rights, by act of Congress; he had seen the colored race throughout the whole land lifted to equality of civil rights by act of Congress. It only remained that he should see them throughout the whole land lifted to the same equality in political rights; and then, the promises of the Declaration of Independence would be all fulfilled. But he was called away before this final triumph. A great writer of antiquity, a perpetual authority, tells us, that “the chief duty of friends is not to honor the departed by idle grief, but to remember their purposes and to carry out their mandates.” These are the words of Tacitus. I venture to add that we shall best honor him whom we now celebrate if we adopt his aspiration, and strive for its fulfillment.

It is as a defender of human rights that THADDEUS STEVENS deserves our homage. Here he is supreme. On other questions he erred. On the finances his errors were signal. But history will forget these and other failings, as it bends with reverence before those exalted labors by which humanity has been advanced. Already he takes his place among illustrious names, which are the common property of mankind. I see him now, as I have so often seen him during life. His venerable form moves slowly and with uncertain steps; but the gathered strength of years is in his countenance and the light of victory on his path. Politician, calculator, time-server, stand aside! A hero-statesman passes to his reward.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolutions.

The resolutions were unanimously adopted, and the Senate adjourned.

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of this House thirty thousand copies of the eulogies delivered in the House on Hon. Thaddeus Stevens, deceased, ten thousand to be bound in cloth.

PHILADELPHIA NAVY-YARD.

Mr. KELLEY. I ask unanimous consent to make a report from the Committee on Naval Affairs, in answer to a resolution of inquiry in relation to the purchase of tools by the chief engineer at the Philadelphia navy-yard, merely to have the report printed and recommended.

Mr. GETZ. One of my colleagues desires that this report should not be made to-day, and on his account I object.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HAMLIN, one of its Clerks, announced that that body had passed an act (S. No. 700) for the relief of Joseph Moorehead, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the following bills and joint resolution of the House:

An act (H. R. No. 1537) to repeal certain provisions of section six of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1867;

An act (H. R. No. 1555) to amend an act entitled "An act imposing taxes on distilled spirits and tobacco, and for other purposes," approved July 20, 1868; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 388) explanatory of the act to create an additional land office in the State of Minnesota, approved July 25, 1868.

REPRESENTATIVE FROM LOUISIANA.

Mr. SYPHER presented the credentials of J. Willis Menard, Representative-elect from the second congressional district of Louisiana; which were referred to the Committee of Elections.

JOSEPH MOOREHEAD.

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire to make an appeal to the House to take up from the Speaker's table and pass a bill which has just come in from the Senate to provide for the care of an insane person. It is a very distressing case and requires immediate action. It is the bill (S. No. 700) for the relief of Joseph Moorehead. I ask that it may be read.

The Clerk read the bill, which provides that Joseph Moorehead, of Ohio, lately a passed midshipman in the United States Navy, now insane, shall be admitted as a patient into the Naval and Military Asylum for the Insane at Washington, District of Columbia, and remain therein so long as he shall continue insane and his guardian shall so desire.

Mr. SCHENCK. I simply desire to say that this application is made in consequence of the burning down of the lunatic asylum in Ohio and the return of this man to his family, where he endangers their peace and lives. He is a retired officer of the Navy, and receives such half pay as will support him in the asylum. I presume he ought to have been admitted to the lunatic asylum here under the law according to the design in the establishment of the institution, but there seems to be some construction of the law that prevents his admission. The Senate passed this bill in order that this man may be got into the asylum before the recess, if possible.

Mr. DAWES. I suggest to the gentleman that the bill had better be amended so as to provide that this man be admitted "in conformity to the rules of the asylum." There may be some rules governing the asylum.

Mr. SCHENCK. The passage of this bill is asked because, on account of some construction of the rules, he cannot be admitted without special legislation.

Mr. DAWES. I suggest the words "otherwise in conformity to the rules." There may be something in reference to the government of the institution with which this would conflict.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will explain how this changes the existing law on the subject, because we ought to act with care in a matter like this.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will send to the Clerk's desk, and ask to have read, a note which I have received from one of the Senators from Ohio upon this subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

SENATE.

DEAR SIR: I have had passed, without objection, a bill to admit Joseph Moorehead, an ex-officer of the Navy, for twenty years insane, and all that time confined in the Columbus Insane Asylum, to the asylum here. He draws full pay now, and his admission here costs nothing, as his pay is reserved for his support. It is a pressing and distressing case, as he is now at large and endangers a family in Zanesville. Please have it passed before the recess.

Truly yours,

JOHN SHERMAN.

General SCHENCK.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have only to say in relation to this man that he became insane while he was an officer in the Navy. I do not know what construction of the law prevents his being admitted to the asylum here. But being a resident of Ohio, he has been for about twenty years kept as an insane person there. The Ohio asylum having been burnt down, he has been returned to his friends at Zanesville. It is right that, being an officer of the Navy, he should be admitted to the asylum here provided by the General Government.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, received its several readings, and was passed.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ELECTION IN LOUISIANA.

Mr. NEWSHAM. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution for consideration at this time:

Resolved, That a select committee of seven be appointed to investigate the irregularities and frauds alleged to have occurred in the State of Louisiana and city of New Orleans affecting the recent election for Representatives to Congress and electors for President and Vice President, and report thereon to this House; and that the said committee may hold sessions in the State of Louisiana by a quorum or by sub-committees of such number as the committee shall designate; and that they have power to swear for persons and papers, to administer oaths to witnesses, and to employ a clerk and messenger, with such stenographic assistance as they shall find necessary.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I would like to have this resolution referred to the Committee on Reconstruction before we are called upon to act upon it.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It seems to me that my colleague ought not to object to this resolution. We passed a resolution the other day without objection from him to investigate the election in New York.

Mr. NIBLACK. I object to the introduction of the resolution for any purpose.

DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION.

Mr. BAKER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

NATIONAL BANK OF THE METROPOLIS.

Mr. ELA, by unanimous consent, introduced the following preamble and resolution; which were read, considered, and adopted:

Whereas it appears from the report of the Comptroller of the Currency that the National Bank of the Metropolis, of Washington, District of Columbia, has been in voluntary liquidation since October, 1886, then owing the United States for deposits $552,712 45; since reduced to $470,954 70, which was secured by a deposit with the United States of $400,000 interest-bearing bonds of the United States; and also that a further deposit of $202,000 of interest-bearing bonds were held to secure the circulation of said bank, all of which is still outstanding; and whereas this bank further appears by said report to have become a depository of United States disbursing officers since it has been in liquidation:

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency inquire and report what legislation, if any, is necessary to enable the Comptroller of the Currency to wind up the affairs of a bank which has no office or place of business, and stop the payment by the United States of interest to a bank upon a debt which the bank owes to the United States, and to prevent an insolvent bank from becoming a depository for United States officers.

Mr. CHURCHILL, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on the Judiciary, a bill (H. R. No. 220) to perpetuate testimony in courts of the United States, with an amendment in the form of a substitute, and moved that the bill and substitute be ordered to be printed and recommitted.

The motion was agreed to.

FELONIES AND MISDEMEANORS.

Mr. CHURCHILL also, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on the Judiciary a bill (H. R. No. 1258) to define felonies and misdemeanors, and to regulate peremptory challenges in the courts of the United States; and moved that it be ordered to be printed and recommitted.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I move to reconsider the votes by which the various bills have been referred this morning; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I move to reconsider the votes by which the various resolutions have been adopted this morning; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COURT BUILDING, ETC.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

MARTIAL LAW IN REBEL STATES.

Mr. MULLINS. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution, which I would like to have adopted; or, if there be objection to its adoption, let it be referred to the Committee on Reconstruction:

Whereas the armies of the United States have, at an enormous cost of treasure and of human life, captured and suppressed the rebel armies under the lead of Jefferson Davis, R. E. Lee, and other rebel leaders; and whereas a large number of said leaders and the confederate soldiery did, as agreed upon, take an oath to be a peaceful and law-abiding people, and to peaceably attend to the ordinary and peaceful avocations and pursuits of life; and whereas great numbers of said rebel leaders and an innumerable number of their former soldiers, together with others of perhaps much more wicked and infamous purposes, have since the surrender of the said rebel armies banded themselves together in an organization known as the Ku-Klux Klan, and perhaps other organizations of a like character and wicked purpose, and have engaged in unlawfully marauding and wickedly murdering our peaceable and law-abiding citizens, spreading terror and alarm in vast portions of the entire South; and whereas it is manifest from the reports of divers persons and the military commanders in portions, if not all, of the late rebel States, that it is now and has been for months past wholly impossible by civil law to suppress those bands and persons so wickedly disposed and give protection to life and needed security to property in those parts of the country which the United States are bound to guaranty to their peaceable citizens: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the civil law in the State of Texas or other portions of the late rebel States be, and is hereby, declared suspended, and that martial law be, and is hereby, declared to exist in said State or other southern States, to the end that the military authority now occupying said State or other parts of the South, or that may hereafter be ordered to said States, suppress and dispose of said wicked and lawless persons according to the military laws and as the necessity of the case demands, so as to restore peace and order so desirable to all good people.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object to the introduction of the resolution. It is very scandalous upon the gentleman's friends.

UNION-PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting copies of certain papers in relation to the Union Pacific railroad, called for by resolution of the House of Representatives adopted on the 15th instant; which, on motion of Mr. PRICE, was referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MAYNARD. There is a bill upon the Speaker's table in which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] is interested, and after the morning hour has commenced I should be glad to have it taken up and acted on. I will now yield to the gentleman from New York to make a statement.

COMMITTEE ON RETRENCHMENT.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I ask unanimous consent to be allowed on Monday to submit a report from the Committee on Retrenchment, merely for the sake of having it printed and recommitted.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

MISS VICTOR.

On motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of Miss Victor.

GEORGIA CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

Mr. PRINCE. I ask leave to submit the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas John A. Wimpy and John H. Christy both claim to have a right to represent the sixth district of Georgia in the House; and whereas the returns show the said John H. Christy had a majority of the votes cast, and the said John A. Wimpy claims that enough fraudulent votes were cast for the said John H. Christy to invalidate his election: Therefore,

Resolved, That the said John A. Wimpy be authorized to give to the said Christy notice that he shall contest the election on the grounds of fraud; that said Christy have ten days thereafter to answer the same, and have thirty days to take testimony from the date of said answer; and that in all things else the testimony be taken and returned in conformity to existing law.

The SPEAKER. This is a privileged question, relating, as it does, to the right of a member to his seat, and it is now before the House.

Mr. WOODWARD. Do I understand the resolution is before the House?

The SPEAKER. It is before the House, being privileged.

Mr. WOODWARD. Is not this matter at this moment pending before the Committee of Elections?

The SPEAKER. The committee can probably answer that question.

Mr. WOODWARD. I will ask the chairman of the Committee of Elections whether the question between these two gentlemen from Georgia is not now before his committee?

Mr. DAWES. It is.

Mr. WOODWARD. I think that is sufficient answer to the resolution, and I move that it be laid on the table.

Mr. DAWES. I did not hear the resolution distinctly; but as I heard it at my desk it proposes to bring some new matter before the Committee of Elections.

Mr. WOODWARD. I move that it be referred to the Committee of Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM A. GRIFFIN.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 648, for the relief of William A. Griffin, for action at this time.

The bill appropriates $2,325 to William A. Griffin, to reimburse him for moneys expended and materials and tools furnished in fitting up the National Cemetery at Andersonville, Georgia, and protecting the remains of Union soldiers in said cemetery.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Has that bill been reported from a committee?

The SPEAKER. It is a Senate bill which has not been referred.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It has been fully examined. The appropriation is only $2,000.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I think the bill should be referred to the Committee of Claims.

The bill was taken up, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

NAVY ESTIMATES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, in answer to a resolution of the House, stating that no reduction can be made from the estimates heretofore submitted; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting a letter from Major W. B. Slack, of the Marine corps, relative to a deficiency in the appropriation for provisions for Marine corps; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PRIVATE BILL DAY.

The SPEAKER stated that this being Friday, and the morning hour having commenced, the first business in order was the call of committees for reports of a private nature, beginning with the Committee on Commerce.

JOSEPH A. INGHAM.

Mr. JULIAN. I ask unanimous consent to report back, from the Committee on the Public Lands, House bill No. 1192, for the relief of Joseph A. Ingham, with a substitute general in its provisions.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Let us hear the bill read first.

The original bill was read a first and second time. It authorizes Joseph J. Ingham, son of a deceased Illinois volunteer, being under the age of twenty-one, to enter eighty acres of public land under the provisions of the homestead act.

The substitute for the bill is entitled "An act to extend the provisions of the homestead act to the orphan children of deceased soldiers who are under the age of twenty-one years." It extends the provisions of the act of Congress of May 20, 1862, and of the acts supplementary thereto to all minor children, not less than sixteen years of age, of soldiers of the United States who died in actual service, upon satisfactory proof as to their ability to fully comply with the requirements of the homestead law as to actual settlement and cultivation.

Section two provides that in such cases the payment of the ten-dollar and five-dollar fee now required shall not be exacted of the person making such entry, and effect shall be given to the foregoing provision according to such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. JULIAN. I have a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, which I send to the Clerk to be read.

The letter was read, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
GENERAL LAND OFFICE, June 24, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to state that I have examined the bill filed by you for our opinion granting homesteads to children of deceased soldiers over the age of fifteen years.

We commend the purpose of the bill, but propose the substitute herewith inclosed. In this the ages has been limited to sixteen years, because the five years' residence and cultivation required will thus bring the party to the legal age of twenty-one years before proving up; an age essential to the requirements of citizenship, &c., imposed by the original act, and to the legitimate responsibilities demanded by general statutes.

I am, sir, very respectfully,

JOSEPH S. WILSON,
Commissioner.

Hon. G. W. JULIAN, House of Representatives.

The substitute was agreed to; and the bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. JULIAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEWIS D. SMITH.

Mr. FERRY, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a bill (H. R. No. 389) for the relief of Lewis D. Smith; which was read a first and second time.

It authorizes and requires the Postmaster General, in settling the accounts of the claimant, postmaster at Iona, Michigan, to allow him a credit of the amount of moneys and stamps belonging to the United States intrusted to his care and stolen from his possession, not exceeding the sum of $1,861 28.

Mr. FERRY. I ask that the report of the committee be read.

The report was read. It states that by affidavits submitted and verified by several of the most prominent and reliable citizens of Iona it appears that the claimant has held the office of postmaster at that place since April, 1865. During that time the post office has been kept in the rear of the ground story of a brick building, sixty feet of which was occupied by L. D. and M. C. Smith as a drug store, and communicating with the post office by a door. The moneys and valuables of the Government were uniformly deposited in one of Lilly's best burglar and fire proof safes, with a combination lock, in which also all the valuables of the firm were kept. On the night of October 15, 1867, not only was this safe, but other safes of business friends in the same place broken open. This safe contained $600 in cash belonging to the Government, and $1,476 in postage stamps, together with $325 in cash, belonging to L. D. and M. C. Smith. Every exertion was made to arrest the burglar and recover the money, but without success. The Postmaster General, in reply to the application for relief, replies that the regulations of the Department will not allow it, but deeming the case an exceptional one commends it to Congress for special consideration.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I believe we have no precedent of this kind; and as the Committee of Claims have had all these things under consideration, it seems to me that committee ought to examine and report upon it. Simply because a man alleges that he was robbed and happens to be a postmaster and had possession of Government funds does not entitle his case to be taken from the ordinary channel and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. There are a great many claims somewhat similar to this that are now before the Committee of Claims, and I hope the gentleman of the Post Office Committee who has this case in charge will allow it to take the same course, so that all our constituents may be treated alike. If I understood the report as it was read rapidly by the Clerk, there is no positive evidence as to the amount which this man had in the safe that night except his own statement.

Mr. FERRY. In answer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I will state that, so far as precedent is concerned, when the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads last had the floor the past session they reported a similar case for a different amount. It was so far similar as to be one of money stolen from the safe of a postmaster, and the House passed a joint resolution granting him relief. The case was reported by my colleague on the committee from Pennsylvania, [Mr. LAWRENCE.] These cases are all properly within the province of the Post Office Committee and of the Post Office Department. The committee have given this case a careful examination, and find the facts verified by several prominent individuals. I hold in my hand a statement verified by them, and the committee and the Postmaster General deem this case an exceptional one and that it merits the relief proposed. I ask, therefore, that the joint resolution be passed.

Mr. COBB. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. FERRY. For what purpose?

Mr. COBB. Well, sir, I desire to say something in the same strain as that said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOFIELD.]

Mr. FERRY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. COBB. In the absence of the chairman of the Committee of Claims, I desire to say that there are a great number of cases similar to this now pending before the Committee of Claims. The committee have given this class of cases great attention, and have, as they think, adopted a very safe rule for their government in disposing of them; and if it is to be the understanding that cases of losses connected with the Post Office are to go to the Post Office Committee, and losses connected with the Navy to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and so on, the Committee of Claims desire to know it, so that they may ask that these cases—not only those that may hereafter come before the House, but those already before the Committee of Claims—may be referred to the other committees for consideration. I think that the Committee of Claims is the proper committee to consider such claims, and that they are more likely to receive consideration upon settled principles from that committee than at the hands of the other committees. I would, therefore, ask permission of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FERRY] to move that this joint resolution be referred to the Committee of Claims, if he will yield to me for that purpose.

Mr. FERRY. I cannot yield for that purpose.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would ask the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. COBB,] who is a member of the Committee of Claims, in regard to a case of this character which I think was sent to his committee, the case of Mr. Bragton, postmaster at Mount Morris, Illinois, which rests on precisely the same principles as the case which the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FERRY] has reported. His safe was broken open and some four or five hundred dollars' worth of stamps stolen.

Now, I think there ought to be some general rule in regard to the matter. We ought to determine whether the Government is to become an insurer. If it does it in one case it ought to do it in all. There should be no discrimination. I think the passage of separate cases is unjust to a great many other men standing in precisely the same position.

Mr. FERRY. I answer the gentleman from Illinois by stating that the committee examine these cases very carefully and have adopted a rule excluding all except such as are recommended by the Postmaster General and based upon ample and undoubted verification. In accordance with this rule this case has been submitted, and among the papers will be found a recommendation from the Postmaster General for this relief. I was unable to hear all that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COBB] said, but I will state to him that this case properly belongs to the Post Office Department and to the Post Office Committee. When a postmaster has used due precaution, as in this instance, where the money was deposited in a safe which was considered perfectly secure and that safe blown open, and not only this money but other money stolen, we have deemed it a proper case for relief. Such cases the committee have deemed to be properly within their province and not necessary to be referred to the Committee of Claims. I now demand the previous question.

Mr. SCOFIELD. If the House shall not sustain the demand for the previous question, will it then be in order to move that this joint resolution be referred to the Committee of Claims?

The SPEAKER. That motion would then be in order.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I hope the previous question will not be seconded.

Mr. FERRY. I will withdraw the demand for the previous question in order to remind members that the House has already established a precedent by the passage of a measure to which I have alluded, reported by my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. LAWRENCE.] As the committee have adopted a rule concerning these cases, one which fixes properly the character of the cases recommended by them for the favorable action of Congress, so that care is taken not to impose upon the House, I think we should now act upon this joint resolution.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I recollect the case to which the gentleman now refers as a precedent. I objected to it at the time because I thought it would be claimed as a precedent. But the gentleman in charge of the case said that it was an exceptional one, and so it was passed. It was brought before the House at a time when there was a slim attendance of members, as is the case to-day. Now I do not know why a better case of this kind from Michigan or from Pennsylvania should be treated as an exceptional case. Let all those cases receive the same treatment and be referred to the same committee that considers the other cases in which the rest of us are interested. Then, if it is right that claims of this character should be allowed, each section of the country will receive its proportion of compensation.

Mr. FERRY. I will now yield to the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It seems to me that nothing can be gained by sending this case to the Committee of Claims, unless it be the desire of the House to establish the rule that every claim of every nature against the Government shall go to that committee. If that rule shall be established, in my opinion the Committee of Claims will have its hands full. That has not been the practice heretofore. Claims growing out of the war have, in a great many cases, been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. Claims growing out of our intercourse with other nations are sent to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. Claims in reference to our postal service, embracing cases of loss of money by postmasters in consequence of robbery or burglary, are sent to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to be passed upon by that committee. Claims in connection with the revenue, growing out of mistakes in the administration of the revenue laws, are sent to the Committee of Ways and Means. And so in cases of claims of different kinds.

Now, if all these claims of every description, growing out of the administration of the law, and in connection with all the Departments of the Government, are to be sent to the Committee of Claims, in my opinion that committee will have more business than it can properly attend to. Besides, when the facts of a case are reported from a committee, as in this case has been done by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY,] is not the House as well prepared to determine upon and settle the principle to govern it as they will be if the case should be reported upon by some other committee? Does it make any difference in that respect what committee happens to report upon a case, unless it be that the House has more confidence in one committee than in another? If that be the principle upon which we are to act we will change our practice in each Congress as we happen in one Congress to have more confidence in a particular committee than in another.

As stated by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY,] the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads have established the principle that they will allow none of these claims for the loss of money or stamps by postmasters in consequence of robbery or burglary without other proof than the evidence of the postmasters, or without an investigation by some agent of the Post Office Department, and a favorable recommendation by that Department. In some cases it has been required that the Postmaster General shall send a special agent to thoroughly investigate the case at the place of the alleged robbery before we will consider and pass upon it.

Mr. FERRY. I wish to state, in addition to what has been said by the chairman of the committee, [Mr. FARNSWORTH,] that this case is more thoroughly fortified than ordinary cases. I hold in my hand a statement of the facts made upon oath by an ex-attorney general of the State, a State senator, the judge of the circuit, and other prominent citizens of the State. We have required, in addition to the oath of the postmaster, a verification by other persons of standing cognizant of the facts.

The committee, before making a recommendation in any case, have required that it should be supported by a recommendation from the Post Office Department. Other claims of this character have been rejected by the committee for lack of such proof and support, and under that rule adopted by the committee. I demand the previous question.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I hope that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FERRY] will yield to me, that I may say a word in reply to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH,] the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. FERRY. I demand the previous question.

On seconding the call for the previous question, there were—ayes 45, noes 22; no quorum voting.

ORDER OF BUSINESS, ETC.

The SPEAKER. Before ordering tellers, the Chair will announce that, under the authority given him by the House, he has asked the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN,] the senior member of the House, to preside as Speaker pro tempore on next Monday. The Chair doubts whether a quorum is now in attendance, and asks consent that if the count by tellers should disclose the absence of a quorum, the remarks in regard to the late member from Pennsylvania, Mr. FINNEY, may proceed, no further business being transacted to-day, the pending bill going over as unfinished business till next private-bill day.

There was no objection.

REMOVAL OF DISABILITIES.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I ask unanimous consent to report back at this time from the Committee on Reconstruction Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 1556) to relieve certain persons of all political disabilities imposed by the fourteenth article of the Constitution of the United States. The House will recollect the statement made on a former day as to the necessity for removing the political disabilities of certain men in South Carolina and North Carolina who have been chosen to office and whose duties will commence on the 1st of January next. The committee have received the strongest evidence that all the persons named in the bill and amendments ought to be relieved. I hope the House will consent to allow the amendments to be reported and acted on immediately.

There being no objection,

Mr. BOUTWELL reported back, without amendment, from the Committee on Reconstruction, Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 1556) to relieve certain persons of all political disabilities imposed by the fourteenth article of the Constitution of the United States.

The amendments were read, as follows:

Insert after the words "Charleston county," in the twelfth line, the following names:

A. L. McCaslan and William Hill, of Abbeville county; John F. Porteous, of Beaufort county; C. W. McFadden, of Chester county; R. H. Edmunds, of Fairfield county; Alexander McBee, H. M. Smith, and William E. Earle, of Greenville county; W. H. Langston, of Laurens county; John C. Secrest, of Lancaster county; Julius L. Shanklin, of Oconee county; Thompson L. Cooke, George Boliver, and William N. Mount, of Orangeburg county; Spartan D. Goodlett, R. E. Holcombe, John W. Singleton, L. N. Robins, and James E. Hagood, of Pickens county; John Heart and William H. Talley, of Richland county; P. Quin Camp and A. E. Smith, of Spartanburg county; R. L. Heriot, of Sumter county; and Charles W. Geddes, of Charleston county, South Carolina; Edward Cantwell, of Hanover county, and W. J. Clarke, of Craven county, North Carolina.

Amend the title so as to read as follows:

A bill to relieve certain persons of all political disabilities imposed by the fourteenth article of amendments of the Constitution of the United States.

The amendments were concurred in.

Mr. BOUTWELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. BROOKS. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Reconstruction be authorized to send for persons and papers in conducting the examination relative to reconstruction in Georgia, Mississippi, Texas, and Virginia.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the committee will have that authority.

There was no objection.

LEWIS D. SMITH.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon the demand for the previous question upon the bill (H. R. No. 389) for the relief of Lewis D. Smith. On this question no quorum voted. The Chair appoints as tellers the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FERRY] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOFIELD.]

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 65, noes 38; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER. No quorum having voted, the bill, in accordance with the understanding agreed to by unanimous consent, goes over as unfinished business till next private-bill day.

DEATH OF HON. DARWIN A. FINNEY.

Mr. PETTIS. Mr. Speaker, since the adjournment of this body last July an event other and beside the one solemnized yesterday has occurred, which I suppose it becomes this House to notice. But for its occurrence I should not now occupy a seat upon this floor, and but for the proprieties of life in this connection, the silence now broken by my stranger voice I should now, at least, have studied to keep. I, of course, refer to the death of Hon. DARWIN A. FINNEY, late a Representative from the twentieth congressional district of Pennsylvania.

Mr. FINNEY was born at Shrewsbury, in the State of Vermont, in the year 1814, and I believe was fifty-four years of age at the time of his death. He removed from the State of Vermont to that of Pennsylvania about the year 1838, locating at Meadville, which was ever afterward his home. He graduated with high honors at Alleghany College, in the city of his adoption; afterward reading law, and, I believe, being admitted to its practice about the year 1842.

Mr. FINNEY was elected to the Senate of the State of his adoption in 1854, was reelected in 1857, and served his constituents acceptably until 1860. In 1866 he was elected a member of this Congress, but I believe was in his seat but a few days during the short session of 1867. The condition of his health while he was in this House was not such as to enable the members to form a correct estimate or obtain a full measure of the man. There were, however, gentlemen on this floor on both sides of this Chamber who had had professional and legislative association with him in his palmier days, and who, I may safely say, will take pleasure in testifying to his ripeness as a scholar, his success as a legislator, his aptness in debate, his power as a reasoner, his ability as a lawyer, and his nobility as a man. The principles of humanity, benevolence, and charity, I suppose I might say, were the distinguishing traits of his character. Many a destitute fireside circle that has been warmed and brightened up by the liberality of his benefactions now dwells in sadness and gratitude upon his memory, while the desolation of his absence gathers like a deep shadow of gloom.

His clear-eyed sense of justice, tempered with that mercy which always lived in his own warm heart, endeared him to all with whom he became acquainted.

He had as a lawyer few equals and no superior in western Pennsylvania. He was not great in the sense by which the greatness of "the great commoner" was measured; but yet, Mr. Speaker, he was a great man, and only differed from Mr. STEVENS as one star in the heavens differs from another.

It cannot be said of Mr. FINNEY that he strayed or lingered by the way for the purpose of selecting bright or beautiful flowers for the purpose of adorning his expressions, and yet few men either of the present or the past could submit their views on humane and professional questions with greater force or more peculiar and characteristic eloquence. There was more weight in his arguments and speeches than poetic diction in their surrounding, and his success came chiefly from the prodigious power of his reason.

Even after disease had fastened upon his vitals death for him had no terrors. Encouraged with the belief that a voyage to the Old World would have a healing and restoring effect upon his shattered constitution, and assured if warmer climes and more bracing breezes did not restore lost or impaired health he could return home to die upon the soil he loved best, he consented to try the experiment; and in pursuance of that resolution sailed from New York, I believe, in the autumn of 1867, accompanied only by his devoted and accomplished wife. He continued, I am informed, his travels in the Old World until, not only paralyzed but prostrated by the ravages of disease, on the 25th day of last August, at Brussels, Belgium, he died of disease of the heart. He was deprived of the consolation of dying at home amid the scenes and associations that would have steadied his heart and assured his faith; and although his death was not entirely unexpected in the State of his adoption, yet the intelligence of the sad event was received in that State and the city in which he had lived from his young manhood, and where he was more than loved, with profound sorrow.

It may not be proper, Mr. Speaker, for me to invade the sanctity of the private circle for the purpose of referring to the more ennobling traits of this man's character; but this much I trust I may be permitted to say: that it was there that he was loved the best, and for him in life that circle had the strongest attachment of earth.

Months have elapsed since he yielded up his spirit to God who gave it, and yet the anguish which his death caused to a devoted and amiable wife and loving brothers, who still survive him, has only given place to that silent sorrow which still hovers over the virtuous dead.

I might have found, Mr. Speaker, all the consolation in silence that this earth can afford to sorrow that nestles about the soul and chills the heart when an associate in life's struggle has passed from a state of suffering and pain to one of glory which is everlasting. But I have, under the circumstances, deemed proper this audible testimonial on my part to departed worth, and I have, I believe, nothing to add outside the resolutions which I ask leave to introduce, and request that they may be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That the House has heard with deep emotion the announcement of the death of Hon. DARWIN A. FINNEY, a member of this House from the State of Pennsylvania.

Resolved, That this House tender to the relatives of the deceased the amount of its sympathy on this afflicting event, and as a testimony of respect for the memory of the deceased the members and officers of this House will go into mourning by wearing crape on the left arm for the period of thirty days.

Resolved, That the Speaker appoint a committee of nine to attend the remains of the deceased on their arrival at New York from that city to the place of interment.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate a copy of the foregoing resolutions to the widow of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the House do now adjourn.

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Speaker, I second the resolutions. Intimate associations in personal and political life are necessary to impart interest to whatever may be said of a deceased friend; hence I have listened to the remarks of my colleague, who has just taken his seat, with great pleasure and with increased admiration of DARWIN A. FINNEY, who after a triumphant election to this House was so soon removed by lingering illness and death. Yesterday we devoted ourselves to embalming in the memory of our fellow-countrymen the ripe statesman, the time-honored patriot; to-day we speak of one of far less matured years, who, coming from the State of Vermont, as did Mr. STEVENS, was welcomed to Pennsylvania and was honored long ago by her citizens and known everywhere within the limits of the Commonwealth. Office sought him, and in the important trusts confided to him his record is clear, untarnished, distinguished. As a State senator he was the leader of a body of able men, and when he retired from the responsible duties of that position his colleagues regretted that one so prominent among them was leaving the seat he had so well filled.

During his two terms, covering six years, he sustained a reputation of which any one might be proud, and those who served with him have borne unreluctant testimony to his freedom from envy and jealousy, too apt to be engendered in political life. He despised small things. He loathed the man who attempted to mount to fame regardless of feeling or personal friendship, and utterly detested the tricks of the mere schemer seeking the applause of the public. He eschewed selfishness; and the idea to him that promotion to high places was so often its reward that the call of his fellow-citizens alone brought him from the domestic retirement he so greatly enjoyed. Never did he voluntarily consent to enter the arena of strife for office, but yielded when necessity demanded it and when those who knew best the requirements of the public service put him before the people as the exponent of sound principles at times when success was impossible, with as little reluctance as when with certainty of an election he consented to bear the cares from which representative life is never free.

In fact, he looked upon representation as an honor, and to him the free choice of the people to any position, however limited in importance, was a compliment to be regarded and a commission to be accepted in their behalf, whatever might be the range of duties to be performed. With him the principle was representation, deeming it the very vitality of our institutions, and not waiting to consider whether his name was to be known beyond the limits of his county or State. Thus he never hesitated, but proceeded, and without faltering in that thorough independence of action, the result of a well-balanced mind and so marked a characteristic of his temperament, to the fulfillment of the humblest or highest duty, encroaching often upon his valuable time and interrupting him in his very extended practice of the law in all the courts of his neighborhood. Yet his generous disposition and his utter disregard of self made it impossible for him to interfere with the proper ambition of others. This trait of character, so clearly visible in Mr. FINNEY, endeared him to his friends, gave him the respect of the community in which he lived, and from the Allegheny to the Delaware his death was deplored as of one lost, whose manliness, unselfishness, and integrity in office could not well be spared. If there were no other reason why we should honor him, this total discarding by him of selfishness as the means of success should be enough for us to order an imperishable impression to be made upon our Journal of the condolence of the House of Representatives on the decease of a member so high-toned and of such rare personal dignity.

Mr. FINNEY had many warm friends among my constituents, and in the other Philadelphia districts. I had known him by reputation as a sound lawyer some years before I met him at the capital of Pennsylvania. I speak of him to you just as I have known him, and although my intimacy was not of long continuance while he was a Senator of our State, yet, after I had left official position at Harrisburg, I was quite frequently in the habit of seeing him and of enjoying his pleasant society. His friendships were lasting. His warmth of feeling and social attachments were greatly to be admired. Plain in his expressions of good will, with nothing offensively demonstrative in his evidences of affection and regard, his devotion to a friend was never clouded, but was clear, bright, and unconcealed; his manliness was ever apparent, and deceit and cunning never for a moment held a place in his noble heart. How it rejoices me, my fellow-members, when I think that had he lived to make your acquaintance, you would have cherished him as his friends did. You would have been charmed, as all who knew him well were, and would have added a word on this solemn occasion in praise of such a character, while you would have lamented that his death had severed an attachment you would have wished never to have been broken. Those of us who believe that republican principles are the only true principles upon which our Government can be carried on have been deprived of the companionship of one who, at an early day and to the hour of his death, had been devoted to their advocacy. His republicanism was outspoken and uncompromising. Just as you knew from the manner of the man that he was your social friend, so in your political associations with him you would have recognized how his very heart and mind were exercised for the success of the doctrines of the party to which he belonged.

He was a thinker. He investigated a subject thoroughly, and when convinced his thoughts came from him with a concentration scarcely ever excelled. He was not an orator in the strict sense of the term. He was more, for he possessed that power of thought and reasoning which gave to his words an overwhelming force. With no want of language he riveted the attention of his audience by his directness, earnestness, and the feeling he always created in his hearers of his desire to bring before them the subject he was discussing compactly and pruned of every ambiguous and unnecessary word. The short time he occupied his seat afforded him no opportunity here of debate. I regret it, not that I would intimate in the slightest degree that he had any taste for mere speech-making, but that I would have been delighted to have heard his voice in this Hall, for I am sure he would have commanded your attention. His colleagues felt proud of him, and they knew you would have done justice to his ability. His loss to them is great, indeed, and the State of Pennsylvania suffers in his death, for her interests were always safe in his hands. She gave him to the Republic, which he would have loved to have been spared to serve in the national councils. Yesterday and to-day our beloved Commonwealth deeply deplores her afflictions. She has some consolation, for the remains of her elder son are buried under her own soil; but she still weeps because her hills and valleys did not receive the dying breath of the younger.

Mr. RANDALL addressed the House. [See Appendix.]

Mr. WOODWARD. Mr. Speaker, yesterday was devoted to funeral eulogies on the late Mr. STEVENS; to-day we are called on to mourn the untimely taking off of a younger and less distinguished, but nevertheless a very estimable Representative of Pennsylvania—one who had already done the State some service, and had given promise of larger usefulness in the future. In my judgment, Mr. Speaker, it is well for us to pause in the midst of the excitements and bustle of our daily lives to contemplate these frequent instances of mortality, and to realize "what shadows we are and what shadows we pursue." Very soon these places that know us now will know us no more. The lesson to be learned from the dispensation that has stricken down two of our Pennsylvania Representatives since last session is that if we would sleep well in death, if we would rest from our labors and have our works to follow us, we must be faithful to the duties of life. It may not be possible for us to perform so distinguished a part in the drama of life as those who have gone before us, but we can be as believing, as industrious, as honest, as courageous, as humble as they.

Mr. FINNEY lived in a part of the State remote from me, and I never had any opportunity for social intercourse with him. I knew nothing of him in private life, but I can easily believe that the sterling qualities of character which the public were permitted to see, were powerful magnets to draw private friendships very close to the heart. I would not wonder if he were an idol of the domestic circle. And there are no doubt silent mourners, who do not like us waste grief in words, to whom he was unspeakably precious, and who will hold him in affectionate remembrance long after our poor words are forgotten.

Mr. FINNEY first attracted my attention while he represented one of the western districts of our State in the senate. The judges of the courts, feeling that they were overworked, had asked for an increase of salary. They encountered the customary objections to such measures, but Mr. FINNEY met the objections and the objectors with an energy that overcame them utterly, and secured, not all he sought, but such increase of judicial salaries as laid all the judges, and I may add all the people of Pennsylvania, under lasting obligations to him.

As a lawyer I had opportunity to observe that he was an honorable and skillful practitioner. There is no profession or occupation which brings out character into such sharp outlines as the practice of law; and in the interior counties of Pennsylvania the lawyer is a man of all work. Not only is he an attorney and barrister, but he is a special pleader, a conveyancer, a land agent, a collector of debts, and very frequently the executor of his client's will or administrator of his estate and guardian of his minor children. Besides all this, he is expected to lead in every local improvement. He is to be the foremost man in the community in building churches, school-houses, turnpikes, and other internal improvements; and he is to sympathize with and direct all the movements of the social life by which he is surrounded. Mr. FINNEY fulfilled faithfully all these multifarious conditions. That he made himself acceptable to his fellow-citizens and neighbors is shown by their persevering preference of him for high and honorable positions. And in these positions, as in the practice of his profession in the courts, he exhibited a high order of talents, as well as an exalted standard of manhood. Had he been spared to the usual age of man he would no doubt have achieved a national reputation like that he had already won in our great State, and which will descend as a rich legacy to his family.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The resolutions authorize the Chair to appoint a committee of nine to attend the remains of the deceased, when they arrive at New York, to the place of interment.

DEATH OF HON. THADDEUS STEVENS.

Mr. KELLOGG. I present to the Senate resolutions passed by the Legislature of the State of Louisiana, in August last, touching the death of the late Thaddeus Stevens. I regret, in consequence of the delay of the mail, that they did not sooner arrive. I ask that they be read.

The Secretary read the resolutions, as follows:

Joint resolutions expressing the respects of the General Assembly of the State of Louisiana in memory of the death of Hon. Thaddeus Stevens, late member of Congress from the State of Pennsylvania, and tendering their sympathy to the many friends and relatives of the deceased.

Whereas it has pleased an all-wise Providence to remove from the councils of the nation one whose identity with the interests of the common country he has left the heritage of the people; and whereas it is meet and proper that an expression is due the memory of the deceased: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the senate and house of representatives of the State of Louisiana in General Assembly convened. That in the death of Hon. Thaddeus Stevens, late member of Congress from the State of Pennsylvania, the country has lost an able son, the cause of republicanism an ardent advocate, and the people a sincere friend.

Be it further resolved. That the sympathy of the senate and house of representatives is hereby tendered the relatives of the deceased. That these resolutions be entered on the minutes of both houses of the General Assembly, and published in the official journal of the State of Louisiana, and that copies thereof be transmitted to our Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States.

Be it further resolved. That the desks of the president of the senate and speaker of the house of representatives of the State of Louisiana be draped in mourning for the space of thirty days.

Adopted in General Assembly, in the city of New Orleans, this 14th day of August, in the year of our Lord 1868.

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

H. C. WARMOTH,

Governor of the State of Louisiana.

A true copy:

GEORGE E. BOVEE, Secretary of State.

The resolutions were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILLEY. The Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the letter of the Commissioner of Patents containing detailed statements of expenses, &c., of the office, have had the same under consideration, and directed me to report a bill, and also to ask that so much of the communication of the Commissioner as printed as consists of his letter and abstracts of expenses accompanying it.

No. 191) explanatory of an act of Congress approved March 3, 1865, entitled "An act extending the time for the completion of certain land-grant railroads in the States of Minnesota and Iowa, and for other purposes;" which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 715) to legalize certain land locations; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOWE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 717) to amend an act entitled "An act to aid the construction of certain railroads in the State of Wisconsin," approved May 5, 1864; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ABBOTT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 718) to authorize and require the reissue of land scrip to the State of North Carolina; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

CONDITION OF GEORGIA.

Mr. POMEROY. I ask leave, without previous notice, to introduce a bill relating to the State of Georgia. I would not have introduced this bill if I had seen in any of the other bills on this subject a mode of relief, which I thought would be the most easy of attainment for that State. I find that the constitutional convention of Georgia did not dissolve, but adjourned for one year, subject to be called together if Congress should require anything further in relation to reconstruction. But the difficulty with the constitution of Georgia is that it prescribed no qualifications for holding office. This bill simply provides for the reassembling of that convention, requiring of them to put in a qualification for holding office not in conflict with the amendment of the Constitution of the United States called the fourteenth article, and then to submit that constitution thus amended to Congress; and when approved, then for the reassembling of their State Legislature organized according to the constitution. That, I think, will reconstruct the State of Georgia; at any rate that is my bill.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce bill (S. No. 716) to provide for the reassembling of the constitutional convention of the State of Georgia, and prescribing the duties of the same; and it was read twice by its title.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to say, in connection with the observation of my friend from Kansas; that I think one of the chief virtues of the constitution of Georgia, which has been recently adopted, is that it does not have any qualifications touching the right to hold office, but gives that right to every citizen of the State "without regard to race, color, or previous condition," as the technical phrase is. If my friend means to say that he thinks its construction is to legalize the conduct of that body that called itself a Legislature which met there a while ago, and to hold that that body acted in accordance with its fundamental law in expelling nearly one third of its members because there was a different shade of complexion to them, then I think he is decidedly mistaken.

Mr. POMEROY. If the Senator, as I presume he has, has read the constitution carefully, he will see that it is silent on the question of holding office.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Exactly.

Mr. POMEROY. What the Senator says is only implied. The facts are that that constitutional convention before it adjourned legalized, if any constitutional convention can do it, all the laws of the State not in conflict with the constitution; and the constitution expressly providing nothing in relation to holding office, it legalized, as they construed it, the old law of the State, which was that no colored man should hold office. The constitution which we accepted legalized that old law. There being nothing in the constitution against it, they have construed that that was binding on the Legislature.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do you think that is a correct construction?

Mr. POMEROY. I do not think it is; but that is their construction.

Mr. STEWART. I think the constitution of Georgia is a little more than silent. I do not think it is silent on this subject. The first section provides who shall be citizens of the State: all who are born in the State and all who are naturalized under the laws of the United States. Then the section that does prescribe the qualification of members of the Legislature says that they shall be citizens.

Mr. POMEROY. They are all citizens. Women are citizens, but not voters.

Mr. STEWART. It says all male citizens over the age of twenty-one years; so that I think the constitution of Georgia, by a fair construction, guarantees to all the male citizens of the State over the age of twenty-one years, not convicted of crime and laboring under no disabilities of that character, the right to hold the office of member of the Legislature. I think that is very clear. It can bear no other fair construction.

Mr. POMEROY. The fact that a constitution provides that all the citizens of the State shall have equal rights is not construed in any of the States to mean that they have equal political rights. The constitution of Georgia does say that all male citizens of a prescribed age may vote; but it is not all the voters who are entitled to hold office, as they construe it, because they had a law legalized by this constitutional convention prohibiting a certain class from holding office. We accepted the constitution with that provision, and I want the constitutional convention to reassemble, it having provided for its reassembling if called together, and adjust that question. I do not want it left to construction. One lawyer or judge may construe it in one way and another in another. This question of holding office should not be left to construction.

Mr. HOWARD. I merely rise to make an inquiry of the honorable Senator who last addressed the Chair, whether the bill he has now presented contemplates any alteration or change in the operation of the act which we passed at the last session authorizing the readmission of the several recently insurrectionary States into the Union?

Mr. POMEROY. The provisions of that act are held in abeyance.

Mr. HOWARD. Let me call the Senator's attention to a clause in the first section of that act: "That each of the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, Alabama, and Florida, shall be entitled and admitted to representation in Congress as a State of the Union when the Legislature of such State shall have duly ratified the amendment of the Constitution of the United States proposed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress and known as article fourteen," upon certain fundamental conditions which do not relate to this subject. The query which I wish to put to the honorable Senator is this: whether or not the right of that State has not already become fixed and unalterable by our own legislation; and by the compliance on the part of the Legislature of Georgia with those terms? It is, I think, an important question. I desire to know whether the bill he has now introduced has in view the alteration of the act to which I have alluded, and if so, upon what ground he bases it.

Mr. POMEROY. The bill which I have introduced suspends the action of that law until after the State has been recognized by the reception of its members in both branches of Congress. The reconstruction act that we passed did not contemplate that our action should be final on the question until their members were received; but when the members from those States were received in the two Houses of Congress that completed the work of reconstruction so far as Congress had anything to do with it. Until that period, however, they are still subject to the legislation of Congress; and indeed I do not know but that they are afterward. They certainly are up to that time. This bill contemplates the reassembling of the constitutional convention of Georgia to complete this work. They anticipated that other things might be required of them, and they adjourned to another time for that purpose. The year is not out.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I understand that the reconstruction laws have been carried out by the State of Georgia; that a portion of her people have formed a constitution in obedience to the mandates of the reconstruction laws, as they are termed. The honorable Senator from Kansas nods his assent. I would modify that by saying "the destruction laws," if he would accept the modification. Now, what is the main purpose and principle of the bill introduced by the honorable Senator? It is to dictate to the people of Georgia, through their convention, which has continued its existence by an adjournment, a particular principle or clause in their constitution. The honorable Senator from Kansas is a very able statesman and a very able constitutional lawyer, and I should be obliged to him if he would suggest to me and to the Senate from whence the Senate derives the power to pass such a bill. If he will give me a legitimate authority for the exercise of such a power, and satisfy me that it is wise, just, and prudent to exercise that power in the form which he proposes, I will vote for the measure.

Mr. POMEROY. The form which I propose is simply the form which has been used in the reconstruction acts. The bill does not require of them any particular qualification for holding office, but only that they shall make a qualification in harmony with the Constitution of the United States as amended by the fourteenth article. If they refuse or neglect to do it, it will still be in the power of Congress to receive or reject their members.

Mr. DAVIS. The honorable Senator has ignored my question. I did not ask him what the reconstruction laws were, or what the convention of Georgia had done in their effort to execute the reconstruction laws, but to tell me the source of power which would authorize Congress to pass the bill which he has now introduced.

Mr. POMEROY. The source of power I apprehend to be the same that existed in Congress at the time of the passage of the reconstruction acts. I hold that we obtained the right to legislate for the States in rebellion by the surrender. The difficulty between the Senator from Kentucky and myself is that I believe the Union cause triumphed, and that in that triumph the rebels surrendered everything that was in controversy between the parties; and one of the things in controversy between the parties was the dogma of State authority over the General Government. They held, and the Democratic party generally have held, that in this Government of ours there were some thirty-seven sovereigns, and that therefore Congress could not legislate for a State; but I apprehend that that dogma of State rights and State sovereignty was surrendered when they gave up their old horses and commissary stores to General Grant and General Sherman; that is, they surrendered not merely the materials of the war, but they surrendered the elements of the war, all that went to make up the controversy and the issues between the parties. They surrendered what they went to war about. They surrendered the question of State rights over slavery, State sovereignty as against the General Government. We acquired the right to legislate for them by that surrender.

Mr. DAVIS. That is the most extraordinary explanation of the principle I have ever yet heard, that a State raising an insurrection or rebellion against the General Government may upon its military coercion surrender its sovereignty and all of its rights into the hands of the General Government. Will the honorable Senator inform me whence the General Government derives its authority to become the depository of such power, and whence States acquire their power to surrender the sovereignty and the reserved rights of the people in the hands of the General Government or any victorious generals acting under the authority of the General Government?

Mr. POMEROY. It does not follow that the State surrenders the reserved rights of the people. It is in regard to State rights that the difficulty with the Democratic party has been from the beginning. I was here when five States had gone out of this Union, and the question was submitted to Mr. Buchanan and his Cabinet what can we do? They met in full Cabinet counsel and discussed it. They adjourned until the next day, when they met and discussed it again, and finally, on the third day, they came to the conclusion, and Mr. Buchanan promulgated it, that there was no power under the Constitution in the General Government to coerce a State; that if rebellion assumed State authority they could not help it, and they had no remedy for rebellion when it assumed the authority of a State organization. They believed that we could put down individual rebels or a rebellion like the Dorr rebellion in Rhode Island; but if rebellion assumed State authority, the State had a sovereignty that the General Government could not coerce. That was the dogma; and it was one of the great difficulties that led to the immense proportions of the recent rebellion.

It was the feeling with men in the South that they owed supreme allegiance to their State. As General Lee said, when he was serenaded at Arlington, the State of Virginia had called him; he deprecated war; he hated above all things civil war; but the State of Virginia, the mother that bore him, had called him to lead her troops, and he owed his first allegiance to the State of Virginia. It was that dogma of his that led him to war against the authority of the national Government, and it was this dogma which the Democratic party have held that led to the dissolution of this Union, so far as State rebellion could dissolve it. My own belief is that State rebellion against the General Government by a State as a political organization is State suicide; that when that political organization rebels, when it forms another government, when its officers swear allegiance to that other government not known to this country, its political organization has committed suicide. That is where we get the right to legislate for these communities, because we conquered them. We were the party that took their surrender; we did not surrender; and in that surrender we took everything that was in controversy, and they submitted. I ask that the bill be printed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I came into the Senate late, and I am not aware what the question is that is now before the body. Will the Chair be kind enough to state it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on referring the bill introduced by the Senator from Kansas to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I have only one word to say to my honorable friend, the Senator from Kansas. His final refuge is now in an opinion expressed by President Buchanan at the time the rebellion had its inception. I think the honorable Senator is in a great strait when he resorts to that opinion of Mr. Buchanan as authority for the introduction and passage of this measure; but the more the honorable Senator is urged upon this subject the more his confusion becomes confounded, the more his darkness is intensified; at least it is so to my mind, and for that reason I shall not follow up this discussion with the honorable Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas, that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLINTON LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 1192) to extend the provisions of the homestead act to the orphan children of deceased soldiers, who are under the age of twenty-one years, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

RENT OF LIBBY PRISON.

Mr. HOWE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested to inform the Senate, if not incompatible with the public interest, whether any of the public money has recently been expended in payment of rent for the use of the building known as the "Libby Prison," in the city of Richmond, Virginia; and if so, how much was paid, to whom, and under what authority of law.

STEAMER WREN.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested to inform the Senate whether or not instructions have been given or proceedings instituted to prevent the payment to John Laird & Company, builders of the Alabama, or their representatives, of the proceeds of the steamer Wren, belonging to said Laird or the confederate government, and now in the hands of the Assistant Treasurer at New York; and what is the condition of any proceedings that may have been commenced to secure to the United States or to the owners of vessels destroyed by the Alabama, the proceeds of said steamer Wren.

NEW REPRESENTATIVE APPORTIONMENT.

Mr. HARLAN. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to report a bill for the apportionment of representatives in compliance with the provision of section two of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think that is a pretty strong resolution. I have no objection to it if the phraseology is changed somewhat; but to instruct the committee to report a bill on so important a subject as that, without any consideration whatever, would seem to be a little unusual in the Senate. I suggest to the mover of the resolution that he modify it so as to direct the committee to inquire into the propriety of reporting such a bill.

Mr. HARLAN. I have no objection to the modification.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be so modified.

The resolution, as modified, was agreed to.

DUTIES ON IMPORTED COPPER.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1460, regulating the duties on imported copper and copper ores, according to the notice I gave yesterday.

Mr. WHYTE. I trust that the bill to which the attention of the Senate has been called by the Senator from Michigan will not be taken up to-day for consideration. Representing in part here a very large interest in the copper mining and smelting of the United States, and desiring that the objections of that interest to the passage of this bill, which, in their opinion, is a species of class legislation for the benefit of a favored few to the injury of the many, should be presented to the Senate, I applied to the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Finance on Thursday last, and inquired of him when the bill would be considered. I applied to him, as I supposed was usual in such cases, presuming that it was the habit of the Senate to allow the chairman of a committee having charge of a measure to control it to a certain extent, or, at least, that a statement made by him would have due weight with his brother Senators. I applied to him and asked him whether this bill would be considered before the recess. He informed me that while it had been reported, and reported much earlier than I had supposed it would be reported from the committee, it was not the intention of those having it in charge to call it up until after the expiration of the holiday recess. Relying upon that, I told a number of gentlemen who were interested in the subject that it would not be called up before the holidays, and therefore the information which they desired to communicate to my colleague and to myself, representing them here, was not then communicated, and they left the city, and the most important one of the number went directly to the city of New York. I have had no means of communicating with him since the announcement yesterday by the Senator from Michigan that he intended to call the bill up to-day, and therefore we are unprepared, at least those from Maryland who are in this Chamber are unprepared, to state the views and objections of those who are better informed upon the subject than we are.

I presume I must have erred in supposing that the chairman of the committee could make any statement which would have even the slightest binding effect upon other members of the committee or the Senate; but really I was under the impression that a statement from the chairman that a bill would not be called up until a certain period would be respected and honored by every member of the Senate. I am at fault in so acting, but I appeal to the Senate—as a few days' delay can certainly do little damage to the bill—to allow this bill to go over until the reassembling of the Senate. I shall make no objection to its being called up on the first day of our session after the holiday recess has expired.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, the parties in interest in the State of Maryland have been frequently heard before this body. Their argument has been spread upon the table of every Senator session after session heretofore, and their whole argument, I believe. The real point at issue is this: Chilian ores, the product of penal labor, are brought in at a nominal duty. When the product of the year 1868 was ascertained a certain smelting company, with a small amount of capital, perhaps a million or two, I do not know how much, went into the market and sold thousands of tons of copper when they had neither the ore nor the copper, at a loss if this bill passes, for the purpose of breaking down the copper mining interests of the United States. They immediately telegraphed and sent over the world for copper to come in from abroad to fulfill these contracts which were intended to break down the copper-mining interests of the United States.

It is now, sir, in my judgment, of vital importance that this be headed off, and that it be done now. The amount of capital invested in the copper-mining interests is over fifty million dollars. The amount invested in these smelting works is very small. I cannot say how much, for I have not had occasion to investigate it; but it is comparatively small. The cost of mining and delivering a pound of copper is twenty cents; $400 a ton. The cost of smelting it is a cent and a quarter a pound; twenty-five dollars a ton. Now, sir, is all this vast capital to be sacrificed for the benefit of a single smelting company? I hope that immediate action will be taken. I gave notice yesterday, and I have given private notice heretofore, that I should call up this bill at the earliest possible moment and press it to a vote if the Senate would permit me to do so. I hope the bill will be taken up, and that it will be pressed to a vote to-day.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am in favor of this bill, and I think the copper interest ought to have some relief; but I think it would be extraordinary in the face of the statement already made by the Senator from Maryland and in the face of the statement I made yesterday to take it up in violation of the understanding at the time it was reported. I do not suppose the Senate will do that. This bill was reported by my vote, and I heartily approve of it; but there are two interests that are very strongly opposed to it: one is the smelting interest in Baltimore, smelting the ores of Vermont, Tennessee, and other States, and also foreign ores; another is the commercial interest represented before the Committee on Finance by several members of the House of Representatives, who say they were taken by surprise by the passage of this bill in the House. The Committee on Finance at first determined to lay the matter aside and not to act upon it, but on subsequent reflection and on the urgent representations of the Senator from Michigan, who stated that this interest was in a distressing state, we concluded to report it, as we were in favor of the bill, but with an understanding that it should not be called up until after the holidays, so as to give those parties opposed to the bill an opportunity to make their statements through their Senators to the Senate. Now, for us to take up and pass now this bill, sent to us at this session, would be rather extraordinary. I suppose the Senate will not do it. I should regard it myself as a very harsh thing, and it would place me in a very unpleasant attitude. I am in favor of the bill, and shall support it and urge its passage with the Senator from Michigan; but to pass it now in the face of these representations would place the Committee on Finance in a very embarrassing position. It would look like a trick on these parties, which certainly was not designed.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, of course I am unaware, except as informed by the honorable Senator from Maryland, of the understanding between himself and the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance in regard to the time of taking up this measure for discussion, but such is the pressing, urgent nature of the bill, and such is the inconvenience to the mining companies engaged in that kind of business in my own State, as well as other States of the Union, that I must ask the Senate most earnestly to take this bill up for consideration and not to delay it. Delay at this time cannot but be injurious in the end to this great mining interest, which it is one of the objects of this bill in some degree to protect. Why, sir, delay the consideration of this bill, delay its passage for ten days or more or less; let that be announced to the country as the action of the Senate upon the subject, and orders will pass over the cable from Baltimore, and perhaps other places in the United States, to Swansea, in Wales, and other copper exporting ports of Great Britain, and before we can act upon the bill as it becomes us to act the American market will be glutted with copper from foreign countries at a very small rate of duty.

Now, sir, while I am up let me state a few facts in regard to the necessity of taking up this bill. The amount of money actually invested in my own State in mining, not smelting, copper is at the present time undoubtedly not less than $67,000,000, including the capital stock which has been paid in by the companies for the last twenty years, and including also the improvements which they have been obliged to make upon their mines in working and in protecting them. The number of mines in the Lake Superior country alone within the last two or three years, I do not remember exactly the period, has not been less than eighty, which have been operating at no great advantage to themselves. The occurrence of the war was a great drawback upon their prosperity, and at the present time such has been the want of protection against the foreign article that only eleven of those mines are in operation. They have been obliged to close up their works, to dismiss their hired men, who have gone to other places to seek employment, and I am told by a very intelligent gentleman, who is better acquainted perhaps with this branch of business in my own State than any other, that at the present time there are not less than fifteen hundred tenements in the Lake Superior country once occupied by miners and the employés of the mines which are now tenantless, boarded up, and their families have gone away and are seeking elsewhere for employment because they can no longer be employed by the companies which once employed them. In short, the present state of things, in regard to the copper mines of Lake Superior particularly, threatens immediate and certain ruin to the companies, and unless Congress shall come to their aid speedily they will be obliged to abandon all their works and this immense amount of capital will be almost totally lost and destroyed.

I appeal to the friends of American industry, I appeal to the friends of protection to a reasonable degree, to take this great interest not only of my own State but of other States of the Union into consideration, and give those companies the aid which they honestly deserve. I hope, sir, that the bill will be taken up and that we shall proceed to its consideration and pass it. I know of no measure at the present time more urgent or more necessary for the protection of one of the great branches of the industry of the country.

Mr. VICKERS. I hope that this bill will be postponed. The reason assigned by the Senator from Michigan who was last up with regard to the amount involved in it is, I think, the strongest reason why it should be deferred. The interest seems to be of great magnitude; and, if it is so, it is important that the Senate of the United States should act with due consideration, and not hastily. It is more important that they should have full information, that their action may be judicious, than that they should act without full information and hastily, perhaps to the prejudice of other interests.

I do not perceive that if telegrams are sent over the cable for the introduction of copper ore it could be brought into this portion of the country within two weeks. It would be impossible for it to be shipped and landed within two weeks; and if this bill is taken up on the first day of the session after the recess surely no great injury can result from the delay.

But again, the Senator seems to assume that the Senate is to pass this bill as a matter of course. Sir, that assumption should not be entertained for a moment. Although the Senators from Michigan may favor the bill, and properly favor it, it does not follow that the Senate of the United States shall adopt their views. It may be important to modify this bill to some extent; the duties proposed may be too high. Now, without going into the merits of the bill, I understand that if it should pass, the increase of duty, estimating the ton of fine copper at twenty-two hundred and forty pounds, will be from $16 80, the present rate, to $39 80 per ton of fine copper. That would seem to be an enormous increase, if this estimate which has been furnished me is a correct one. Is the Senate hastily to pass a bill by the passage of which such an enormous increase of duty shall be brought about?

Again, how is it to affect the shipping interest? That is an important matter. The tonnage and shipping of the country, in which this copper is used, are entitled to consideration.

I say, then, the magnitude of the interest is a motive for the postponement of this bill. It is to affect other interests beside those of the State of Michigan, and in a different way perhaps. When the bill is duly considered it may, perhaps, be modified to some extent, so as to suit the interests of all the different sections of the country. If it can be so modified, I shall be very glad. I was not in the Senate when the bill was discussed at the last session, if it was discussed then. I had to leave two days before the expiration of the session on account of sickness, and it certainly was not discussed while I was in the Senate. My then colleague is now representing this country on a foreign mission, and my present colleague and myself are new members, not having a full comprehension of the subject.

Then, the understanding which my colleague had with the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance certainly induced him not to expect that the Senate would take up the bill before the holidays, and therefore he is not prepared. Now, shall the Senate, without full information, and without the possibility of obtaining that information which my colleague will at the proper time be prepared to furnish; shall the Senate, now when the interests of different States are to be affected, take up the bill at this particular period? I should hope that a lapse of two weeks would not produce any injury to the mining interests of Michigan, and I hope the Senators from that State will not urge the bill upon the consideration of the body at this time.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I have no doubt that the copper interests need some relief, and at any time when I have an opportunity I propose to vote that relief; but in saying this I do not wish to be understood as favoring this bill in precisely the shape in which it now stands; that is to say, I prefer to have it amended. I suggest to the Senators from Michigan that the bill if passed in its present form will not give any protection whatever, in my judgment, to the copper interests. It is necessary to go further and embrace something more in order to give any protection to those interests. For instance, this bill raises the duty upon pig and other ore in the form of the raw material from two and a half to five cents per pound; and yet it leaves the duty upon copper sheathing and copper plating at three and a half cents per pound. It raises the duty upon copper, but it does not raise the duty upon brass. The duty upon brass is now fifteen per cent., and copper forms the chief alloy of brass. It would follow, therefore, if this bill should be passed in its present shape, that the manufacturers of brass would no longer use American copper for that purpose, but would import the brass.

There are several points wherein this bill should be amended, even to meet the views of those of us who think that copper should have some relief at the present time; and, if it shall be amended, the bill must necessarily go back to the House of Representatives, and cannot be acted upon there until after the recess, because, as I learned a few moments ago, the House has already adjourned from yesterday until Monday, and there is no longer a quorum of the House present in the city. I hope, therefore, that the Senators from Michigan will consent to let this bill remain until after the recess.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. I hope the Senator from Michigan will consent to postpone this bill until after the holidays. I feel inclined to go for his bill, but it is very evident it cannot be passed to-day.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have no doubt we can pass this bill to-day. If there are any amendments that are requisite they can be made by the Senate. But this bill, as I will inform my friend from Vermont, precisely as it is, does furnish a very material relief to the copper-mining interest. It is the introduction of foreign ores that troubles us, not the importation of sheath brass. I admit that there should be an advance of duty on sheath brass and sheath copper, and have no objection to placing them in this bill. My friend from Vermont has an amendment covering that ground; that amendment can be offered, and it may be adopted. I hope that the bill will be taken up and its consideration proceeded with, and that it will be passed to-day, as I have no doubt we can pass it. I ask for a vote on taking it up.

Mr. FERRY. Mr. President, it is apparent, from the statement which has been made by the Senator from Maryland and also by the chairman of the Committee on Finance, that although it is possible if this bill be taken up that it may be passed to-day, in a manner after the fashion of the whip and spur of the previous question in the House of Representatives, it is clear that the bill cannot be passed to-day with fairness to the parties interested in its provisions and to be affected thereby, nor with full information before the Senate of the considerations which ought to be presented to it. Why do I say so? The bill having passed the other House on the first day of the session in the manner which I have indicated, and remained but a short time in the hands of the Finance Committee of the Senate before it was reported here within three days last past, the authorized exponent of the views of the Finance Committee informs the parties most affected disastrously by the bill that it is not understood by that committee that the bill shall be considered by the Senate until after the holidays; and upon this statement the gentlemen who are interested, and whose interests may be, as I said, disastrously affected by the passage of the bill, have gone to the city of New York to obtain information in an authentic form to lay before the Senate. Now, it certainly does seem to me that any Senator considering these admitted facts will find it difficult to vote to proceed to the immediate consideration of the bill.

When the bill passed the other House, knowing that it would affect to some extent the interests of my constituents, I addressed a letter to a very intelligent gentleman in a large manufacturing town in my State, requesting information upon the subject; and from him I have received a reply from which I wish to read a few words in reference to the question now before the Senate as to the propriety of taking up the bill at this time. He writes:

"I earnestly hope that the copper tariff bill that passed the House will be defeated in the Senate, as it ought to be. It is passed professedly in the interest of the copper miners of Lake Superior, but really in the interest of speculators in mining stocks and copper. Quite an active movement has occurred in copper within the past ten days, and the price has advanced under large purchases by speculators, with no reason for an advance except speculative ones. The interests of the whole country demand cheap copper, and there is no reason for any increase in the tariff growing out of the relation of production to consumption. But, besides, there is a large amount of capital invested on the Atlantic coast in smelting copper from ores, and while more copper and copper ore both are now exported than are imported, the smelters from ore are obliged to have copper ore enough from Chili to make in ordinary times four million pounds of fine copper per annum, in order that they may mix it with the American ore and make good copper. On the other hand, more than this amount of ore is exported to England annually from California."

He refers to the statement made by Mr. Martin, of Maryland, which has been referred to by one of the Senators from that State, and says:

"The positions of Mr. Martin, of the Baltimore company, are inconceivable. He does not state them as strongly as the facts well warrant. I was president of the Detroit and Lake Superior Copper Company for more than a year, from March, 1867, to June, 1868; and am now individually and as trustee largely interested in it, and therefore know whereof I write. This company smelts and refines more copper than any other in the country. It is all from native mineral, none from ores."

"It is true, also, that the effect of the bill is to destroy the business of smelting from ores; at least, I have no doubt of such being its tendency, and I know such is its object. None of the Lake Superior miners deny it, and a very large New York operator in copper and copper-mining stocks told me that such would be its effect, and ought to be."

"Notwithstanding the smaller cost of smelting the Lake Superior native mineral, copper can actually be produced cheaper from ores than from the Lake Superior mineral, the whole cost of mining, &c., being included, at the present rate of duty. This advantage the smelters from ores must be deprived of, because they must have an admixture of foreign ores with the American to produce good copper, unless the smelting is done, as at the Tennessee furnace, by charcoal. Who is harmed by this small importation of ores when an equal or greater amount both of ores and fine copper is exported?"

Now, sir, I desire to produce and present to the Senate proofs of the statements which are made by this gentleman, and I desire to produce and present to the Senate statistics in relation to these Lake Superior mining companies and mining stocks; and also in relation to the shipping and commercial interests involved in this bill. It does seem to me that after the representation which has been made from the Committee on Finance that we who oppose the bill ought to have an opportunity to make this presentation to the Senate.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, I do not know who is the author of the paper from which the honorable Senator from Connecticut has read. He speaks with great confidence of the necessity of foreign ores in order to the proper smelting of our native ores. That appears to be the great point of his effort; the absolute necessity of the foreign carbonates to be used in smelting our native ores, and hence the necessity of letting in those foreign ores free or subject to a very trifling duty. I do not propose to go at any length into the consideration of that subject, but as a reply to the statements of the writer, whose letter has just been read to us, I beg leave to read from a letter dated the 20th of June last, written by Mr. C. Raht, secretary of a copper-mining company in Tennessee, who, I understand, is a very intelligent gentleman—

Mr. FERRY. If the Senator will allow me he will find that the letter I read referred to this Tennessee furnace as one where the smelting was done by charcoal. If he listened to the letter I read he would see the distinction it made in reference to the Tennessee furnace.

Mr. HOWARD. I will read a part of this letter, and only a part of it is necessary to be read. Addressing Hon. HORACE MAYNARD, the writer says:

"I duly received your esteemed favor of the 18th instant. The bill proposed in the Committee of Ways and Means will give to the copper-mining interest all the protection needed. The copper production of this country is fully equal to its consumption. Foreign copper, refined or in ores, is not needed for any branch of industry for which our own production would not answer better."

"The assertion made by the Atlantic smelters, that they require foreign carbonates of copper in order to smelt up the native sulphurets and oxides, is a fallacy. We have manufactured at our mines, in Tennessee, during the last year, over two million pounds of fine copper out of sulphurets mainly, and produced an article the quality of which none of the Atlantic smelters have reached."

There is the opinion of one expert upon this subject directly against that of another. If it becomes necessary I can introduce other proof upon this subject which will make it overwhelmingly conclusive. There is no necessity whatever for the use of foreign carbonates of copper in the smelting of our native ores; and the experience of all the native mines in the country is in accordance with this statement. The idea is, as this writer very properly designates it, a fallacy. I hope, sir, that the bill will be taken up and acted upon at once.

Mr. CAMERON. I trust we shall take up this bill now and act upon it. This is the second day that it has been pressed upon the attention of the Senate. It has passed the other House, and if we are ever to take it up we should do it now, and bring before the Senate all the questions in connection with the tariff system. This is an interest in which my State has very little concern—none at all, except that we send coal up to Michigan and they bring down their ores. I know something about the furnaces in Baltimore. There are only two of them, I believe. They are small interests compared with the great mining interest in the Northwest. I have no doubt, with the knowledge I have before me, that unless we pass a bill like this the miners of Michigan will be driven out of employment entirely. The furnaces in Maryland are among the very few in the country. There are two there, I believe, and there are but very few anywhere else in the whole country. They can get their ore, if they will, as cheaply from Michigan as they do now from abroad. It will come down by the lakes to Erie, and down the canal to Pittsburgh, and from thence to Maryland at very little cost; but they have been in the habit of getting it from abroad, and like all other habits it is hard to change.

But my reason for desiring to take up the bill now is, that we have nothing before us of importance to-day. We have met mainly for the purpose of discussing and disposing of this bill, and we had better pass it or defeat it now, and thus save time hereafter. If we do not, it will occupy not only a day, but days, and perhaps even weeks when we reassemble. My desire is to have as little business of this kind, after we come back, as possible. I hope that the Senate will take up the bill, and pass it or not, as they see fit, to-day.

Mr. DIXON. I doubt very much whether business can be very much expedited or hastened by taking up the bill to-day. If it should be taken up to-day, although in a somewhat unprepared state, I shall deem it my duty to discuss it. I shall think it my duty to make some remarks upon it, and offer some reasons why the bill, in my judgment, ought not to pass. If the Senate insist upon it to-day, I, unless some other Senator does so, shall be compelled to go on in opposition to it. I would take up less time of the Senate with greater preparation. I had no idea that it would be insisted upon at this period of the session, and I trust the Senate will not require those who are disposed to discuss the bill to go on with that discussion to-day.

In regard to what the Senator from Pennsylvania has said of the interests in Baltimore and other places, in my judgment they are not so very small as he has intimated. He says they can get their ore in Michigan. Everybody knows it is a very different kind of ore, requiring no smelting, native copper most of it; whereas the other is of an entirely different character—sulphurets, or something of that kind. All these things I propose to go into, and I propose to attempt to show the Senate that the bill ought not to pass. I think the great interests of the country, the shipping and manufacturing interests, do not require it. But I dislike very much to go on to-day, and I hope the Senate will give time for the discussion. I think, as I said in the beginning, that the bill can reach a final conclusion and receive the deliberate action and decision of the Senate better and perhaps even earlier than if it should be pressed at this time.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It seems perfectly apparent that no time can be gained by pressing this bill to-day. I understand the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] proposes an amendment, which the Senator from Michigan intimates he will accept. Then it must go back to the House of Representatives, and of course no action can be taken upon it until after the recess. My sympathies are with this bill, as they are always for any tariff bill. I confess, however, I do not like this system of legislation, picking out first wool, then copper, and then some other article, and leaving the general manufacturing interests of the country without that protection to which they are entitled, and thus dividing the strength which those great interests ought to have; but still, if a bill is introduced which gives proper protection to copper, trusting to the magnanimity of the representatives from the West, who have wool and copper protected, I should probably vote for the bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire to say that this matter will be greatly expedited by pressing it to-day. The House has not adjourned; it will be in session on Monday, and if we adopt the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont the House can concur in it and still make the bill a law on Monday next. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. VICKERS] says that the bill proposes to increase the duty on copper some eighty odd dollars. He must see at a glance that he is very much mistaken. The whole duty proposed is only $67 20, three cents per pound on the ore. He has been misinformed on the subject. I hope, sir, that the bill will be taken up and passed to-day, so that it may become a law before the recess of the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. If the Senator from Michigan will allow me—I see he rather controverts a statement made by me—the House, I understand, have adjourned over until Monday. They had not a quorum yesterday, and there is no probability of their having one, as I am informed, on Monday.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have received my information from a member of the House of Representatives since the Senator made his statement. I hope that the bill will be taken up and considered.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, I do not recognize the wisdom of the reasons given by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. HOWARD] for pressing this bill at the present time. If the mining interests upon the shores of Lake Superior are suffering so much that the houses are closed and the men have gone away to look for employment elsewhere, surely during the Christmas holidays they will not return to their houses to look for that employment which they have already lost. Therefore, but little harm can be done to the men themselves if this bill does not pass before the 5th or 6th of January.

In regard to the other statement, that if this bill does not pass at once orders will go from Baltimore to foreign ports to buy largely of copper and thereby to glut this market, I can say nothing, for I know nothing of any such proceeding having taken place before. I do not believe it; however. The interest in Maryland to which I refer, amounting to more than a million dollars, is held almost exclusively by gentlemen high in influence in the Republican party there, better known to the Senators from Michigan than to me personally; but they are gentlemen who stand high in our community, and I am here in their behalf to ask the Senate not to turn men from the Senate Chamber unheard. They came here in the early part of the week and asked respectfully that they might simply be heard. They were told that it was not necessary for them then to speak; time would be allowed them after Congress reassembled in January; and, as I stated before, relying upon this promise or this understanding of Senators—an understanding which ought never to be tarnished—they have gone home. And now, having heard that this bill is sought to be brought up for consideration by the Senate, in utter astonishment they telegraph across the wires, pleading with the Senate not to put them at such disadvantage. I ask permission of the Senate to read the telegram which I hold in my hand. It is addressed to the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] who has kindly handed it to me:

"Agreeably to understanding, as we supposed, mining, smelting, and shipping interests have been notified that they would be heard after the holidays, and have all responded that they will then be in Washington. Upon this assurance they have acted and rely. We certainly hope you will not allow the tariff bill to come up in the Senate till we are heard."

With this understanding these gentlemen have gone away; and when parties interested as manufacturers and as miners and as shippers and as ship builders have relied upon the assurance of Senators that no action would be taken, and without lodging the information with us which they wished to communicate to the Senate, have returned to their homes relying with perfect security upon that assurance, will the Senate of the United States take up that measure, and, without the information which we desire to communicate, press it to a vote to-day? I am a young member of the Senate, but I have had a traditionary respect for the calm and considerate legislation of which it has heretofore always been an exemplar, and I shall be surprised if on this occasion I shall see any action not in consonance with the reputation that it has heretofore held.

Mr. CHANDLER. I gave notice yesterday that I should call up this bill to-day and press it to a vote. These parties are within two hours' ride of this city, and they could all have been here this morning after that notice was served on them. I ask the Senate for a vote, and I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CATTELL. On this bill I am paired with Senator GRIMES. If he were present he would vote against taking up the bill, and I should vote for it.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 22, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Cameron, Chandler, Corbett, Drake, Harlan, Howard, Howe, Kellogg, Morgan, Morton, Nye, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Pool, Ramsey, Rice, Stewart, Wade, Warner, Williams, and Yates—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cole, Davis, Dixon, Edmunds, Ferry, Fessenden, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Harris, McCreery, Morrill of Maine, Norton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Ross, Sherman, Spencer, Sprague, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Vickers, Whyte, Wiley, and Wilson—25.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Cattell, Conkling, Conness, Cragin, Delittle, Grimes, Henderson, Hendricks, McDonald, Morrill of Vermont, Osborn, Robertson, Saulsbury, Sawyer, Thayer, Tipton, and Welch—19.

So the motion to take up the bill was not agreed to.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 1192) to extend the provisions of the homestead act to the orphan children of deceased soldiers who are under the age of twenty-one years, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

MISS SUE MURPHEY.

Mr. HOWE. I move, if it be necessary to make such a motion, that the Senate resume the consideration of the bill (S. No. 225) for the relief of Miss Sue Murphey, of Decatur, Alabama.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think this bill is of so much importance in its principles and in the precedent it will establish for a very large number of cases, and for the expenditure of a very large amount of money, that it ought to be reconsidered by the committee who reported it, and that we ought to have a written report which shall discuss the principle upon which it proceeds, and which shall govern it and the other cases like it. I have certainly no opposition to this specific claim; I dare say it may be meritorious in a mere intrinsic sense; certainly I know nothing against it; but when I reflect how vast is the sum of money that entering upon this course of legislation involves, and how difficult it will be to distinguish between just and unjust claims all over this wide expanse of southern territory where war and rebellion have raged, I cannot refrain from calling the attention of the Senate to it again, and from moving, as I do now, that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I agree with the Senator from Vermont as to the importance of this question, and as to the large amount that may be involved in the decision of it; but I do not agree with him in the propriety of having it recommitted to the committee at this time. The Committee on Claims have had this question before them repeatedly. There is a written report in this case. What the committee now ask, and what I think they are entitled to, is to have this subject discussed before the Senate and to have a vote of the Senate upon it. Whether this period of the session is the most propitious time for that discussion, I am not prepared to say. When the question is discussed I hope to have a little to say on the subject, but my remarks shall be very brief.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I certainly had the impression the other day, from something that fell from the lips of my friend from New Jersey, that this subject, as involving this principle, had not been considered in the committee, and that this bill might well be recommitted. I evidently misunderstood him, and therefore I withdraw the motion that I made to recommit; and as he says it needs to be further discussed, I move that its further consideration be postponed until the 5th of January.

Mr. HOWE. Now, Mr. President, I have a few words to urge against that motion. It may be that the principle involved in this bill is of immense moment to the country, because of the amount of money that hangs upon the decision of it. I do not concede that. I do not believe that any such amount of money hangs upon the decision of it as is urged here. But what I ask of the Senate is a consideration of the question now, and a decision of it. That I ask in the name of the committee.

Senators say that we ought to be careful about settling this precedent. Sir, there is no question of precedent about it. The precedent, so far as the action of the committee or the action of the Senate is concerned, is settled, if a precedent can be settled—settled in this, that the Senate has already passed this very bill in this very case. There cannot be any mistake, then, about the want of precedent. But it has also passed another bill involving all that is involved in this bill, and a little more. In the case of Ames, after repeated debate, the Senate and the House passed a bill appropriating money for a building which we did not take and use, as is the case here, but which was destroyed in battle, if I recollect the fact.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think that was so; but it was inside of our lines. That was the point.

Mr. HOWE. That is another question. It was actually destroyed by our guns in the course of a battle, if I am not mistaken as to the facts in that case.

Mr. FOWLER. Was not the house taken for the purpose of building a fort there?

Mr. HOWE. Not in that case; but in this case it was.

Mr. FOWLER. In the Armes case also.

Mr. HOWE. No, I think not in the Armes case; but in this case it was taken for the purpose of building a fort.

Now, Mr. President, what is the principle involved here? Senators say that upon principles of public law we ought not to pay for the property of our friends taken within the rebel districts by the Government and for its use. I deny that upon principles of law we are prohibited from paying such claims, or that upon the principles of public law we are permitted to refuse the payment of such claims. I say again, we have legislated upon this question. The question whether we would or would not claim the ownership of property down there, and to what extent we would claim it has been before Congress in a number of instances. It was before Congress in 1861, and you then decided, and put your decision into a public act, that you would confiscate, seize, and appropriate, not the property of your friends in the rebel districts, nor the property of your enemies in the rebel districts, but simply the property which was used by the enemy and for the purposes of the insurrection. That is the extent to which that the first bill on the subject went. If this Government intended to assert the right to appropriate all property down there would there have been any such law as that put upon your statute-books?

But the Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] the other day said that if we could find any principle of law or any authority in public law for the settlement or adjustment of such claims as this, he would cheerfully, as I understood him, vote for the payment of this claim. I think there are several precedents. I have already said that the Senate has passed this very bill. I have already said that both Houses have passed another bill involving this principle. But I wish to call the attention of that Senator and of the Senate to another piece of legislation on this subject. In 1862 you undertook to pass a law and you did pass a law to confiscate certain property down there and to punish certain persons down there. The Senator asserted the other day—and it has been asserted before that day on this floor—that upon well-recognized principles of public law all persons residing within that rebel district were enemies of ours, and therefore that they had no rights which this Government was bound to respect, no rights of person or property. I say that in 1862 you undertook to pass a law to define what you deemed to be their true relations to this Government. What did you say? That you would take all their property and appropriate it to the use of the Government—the property of those who were rebels and the property of those who were loyal also? Certainly not. You said that of certain classes whose guilt you considered the most flagrant you asserted the right to confiscate their property; and in order to discourage the rebellion, in order to intimidate the rebellion, you did incorporate in the same law a provision to the effect that if they did not lay down their arms and cease to fight us within a certain time after notice given by the President, you would confiscate the property of all classes of those, not who lived there, but of all classes who were engaged in prosecuting the rebellion, who were positive, actual enemies.

That is the extent to which the law of 1862 went; and I believe it is within the recollection of the Senator from Maine that he was not particularly in favor of that bill. I certainly was not; and I have not seen the entire wisdom of it up to this time. We both thought then, although it did not propose to strike a single item of property belonging to any friend of ours, that it was an injudicious measure; at least I did, and I understood such to be the opinion of the Senator from Maine at that time. I thought that was going further than it was judicious for us to go then. But, sir, do you suppose, if the public law made us the owners of all the property within that district, we should have stood here haggling over a question about confiscating the property of those who were actually fighting us, who were rebels in fact as well as in law? It seems to me not.

But we had other legislation upon this subject. Recollect the principle asserted here is that all those within that district are our enemies, and to be regarded as the enemies of this Government; and it is said that such is the judgment of the Supreme Court. I deny it. The Supreme Court has not asserted any such doctrine. The Supreme Court did say in the prize cases that all the property owned by the residents of a hostile country—and they applied that doctrine to the rebel districts—was by the prize law to be regarded as enemies' property, and when found upon the high seas it was subject to forfeiture in the prize courts; but whether the Government would avail themselves of the proceeds of such property when forfeited and when the proceeds were paid into the Treasury rested with the Government to say, and they would retain the proceeds or refund them according as the owners of the property were actually enemies or actually friendly. That is the extent to which that decision in the prize cases went.

And why did they assert that this property was regarded as enemies' property? Simply because it was property which was liable to feed and to strengthen the enemy. No matter what might be the disposition of the owner, being a resident within the rebel district his property was liable to seizure for rebel purposes; but what the degree of liability is, it is manifest, depends upon what the property is. The property in this case was the homestead of a woman, consisting of a few acres of land and the house she lived in, erected upon it. That homestead was not capable of being made to furnish much strength to any cause which was being prosecuted by war.

But there was one kind of property down there, Mr. President, which you know, which the Senate knows, which the courts have said, constituted the very sinews of the rebel cause; and that is cotton. To mark the judgment of the national Legislature as to the disposition that ought to be made of that kind of property you passed an act in 1863 by which you declared, what? That the Government should have it all? No, sir; but you said that whatever of that kind of property was captured by our Army or was abandoned by its owners and found down there so abandoned should be turned over to the agents of the Treasury Department. What for? To be sold and the proceeds to be paid into the Treasury? What for? To meet the exigencies of this Government? No, sir; but to meet the judgment of law upon the question whether it belonged to us or to our friends; and you declared there that so far as those proceeds came from cotton which belonged to the friends of the Government, no matter where they lived, they should have the right to follow those proceeds into your courts; you threw the doors of your courts wide open, and allowed them to sue to establish the fact that they were the owners of the cotton and that they were the friends of the Government, and not its enemies; and upon such proof being made your law provided that that money should be paid back to them.

Mr. YATES. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir.

Mr. YATES. I wish to ask the Senator from Wisconsin whether he intends to assert the proposition here broadly that wherever the property of a loyal owner has been taken by the Government compensation must be made to him, or whether the case which he now proposes is an exceptional one? I ask that question because the broad proposition would involve a question of thousands of millions of dollars.

Mr. HOWE. I do not claim that this is an exceptional case at all. I say if there is any honesty in this Government; if there is honesty in this Government to enable it to face its bonds and pay them, it will pay every one of its loyal citizens for every dollar of their property which the Government has had the use of. That is not my proposition exactly, whether it involves thousands of millions or thousands of dollars. If you owe more than you can pay, you should do like any other bankrupt. That does not excuse you for falling back and saying you will not do anything. Do as every other honest bankrupt does: pay as far as your funds go, and then ask a discharge of a bankrupt court for the balance. I do not know of any other honest way of getting along.

I was calling attention to this cotton bill. I say, in that bill you declared that you would not assert any ownership over cotton, the sinews of the rebellion, if it was proved to belong to your friends. In the administration of that law a great deal of cotton was seized and turned over to the Treasury Department. Cotton to the amount of $35,000,000, if I remember aright, was sold, and the proceeds paid into the Treasury. Under the force of the law every one of the loyal owners of that cotton had a right to sue in the Court of Claims. That was the only right preserved to your friends under that law; but they secured another right; and I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Maine particularly to that. I say, in addition to the right preserved to them in the statute they secured another right, and that was, by the adjudication of the Treasury Department money which, according to the theory asserted here and asserted by the Senator the other day, belonged to our enemies, to the amount of more than two million dollars was paid out of the Treasury, and cotton amounting to almost three thousand bales, if I remember aright, was surrendered up to those who, as I understand the Senator's theory, were the enemies of the Government; not enemies in fact, but enemies in law. This was not done under the authority of that statute, for the statute only provided for them to sue in the Court of Claims. Now, I think here is a precedent. If it was right to give up this cotton or to pay out this cash derived from the sale of cotton to those people living down there because they were our friends, is it not right to pay for their homesteads or any other property when we take it and convert it to our own use?

But, Mr. President, the facts in this case, if the Senate will attend to them, will relieve it from all these questions. This property was not in a rebel district. This property was in Decatur, Alabama, which, when we took possession of it, was occupied by our troops, and over it our flag has floated ever since. It was outside of the rebel districts.

Mr. HOWARD. Taken during the war as an act of war.

Mr. HOWE. It was taken during the war. It was taken by order of an engineer officer, and the value assessed by a board of officers convened for that purpose by the officer in command of the district. I do not understand that it was taken as an act of war. Of course it was taken for war purposes, as all commissary stores are.

Mr. HOWARD. Taken during the flagrancy of the war.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Flagrante bello.

Mr. HOWE. So it was. So was Mrs. Alexander's cotton taken during the war. It is true that the court held that the proceeds of that cotton, although it could not be regarded as lawful prize, must be paid into the Treasury. They held it by force of the act of 1863; but they said and they held in that case that that cotton did come within the purview of the law, notwithstanding our troops were occupying the country at the time that the property was taken; but they held so because our troops only held there for something less than eight weeks; it was just a raid made into the country, the troops holding for a short time and being then driven back. The court held, the Chief Justice pronouncing the judgment of the court, that that was not such an occupation of the country by our troops as wrested it from the operation of this principle of law. But that is not this case. Our troops occupied Decatur when this property was taken, and our Government has exercised full control over that territory from that day to this; and the Supreme Court, in the prize cases and in the case of Mrs. Alexander's cotton, and all the courts whose judgments I have read on this point, rest the whole doctrine of the right over enemy's property upon the fact that it is within the control of the enemy, and therefore liable to be appropriated to their use. That was not the case with this homestead; there was nothing like it in this case.

Now, Mr. President, it is said that this is going to involve us in thousands of millions of dollars. I beg leave most respectfully to call the attention of the Senate to one very little experience that the Committee on Claims have had here. The most fearful struggle I have had to get through a bill reported from the Committee on Claims I encountered on a bill that appropriated $400 to the widow of an officer who was shot down in one of your battles, for property taken by the Indians when he was in your service out in New Mexico, and property which he claimed upon the faith of a public statute as plain, as clear, as palpable as any provision in any of your laws under which your bonds have been issued. But what was the objection? Not that that $400 ought not to be paid, but that if we did pay it we were assured there were millions and millions of dollars resting upon just such grounds as that which we should have to pay. It was some two years ago that you appropriated that sum of $400, and I never have heard of any other claim like that before or since.

Now, how much are you likely to be called upon to pay if you accept this principle for which I contend in this case? I do not know how much exactly. I know this, that the war has been closed for something more than three years, and the Committee on Claims have been at work pretty hard during those three years. I know they have reported one bill in favor of Mr. Armes, which, I think, appropriated some fifteen or sixteen thousand dollars. That has passed. They have reported this bill which appropriates $7,000. They reported at the last session another bill which appropriates, if I remember aright, $50,000. And I know of three or four other cases now pending before the Committee on Claims which will involve this principle. I am not sure that there are not as many as half a dozen. Of course I do not undertake to be familiar at the present time with all the facts in all the cases now standing on the calendar of that committee, but I have no belief that there are $500,000 involved in all the claims which are embraced by this principle now pending before the committee three years after the war has closed.

Mr. YATES. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOWE. Certainly.

Mr. YATES. I wish to submit to the Senator whether, in these cases which involve the fact of loyalty, and also the amount and value of property which was taken by the Government and the circumstances under which it was taken, it would not be safer for the Senate and better in every way that they should be referred to the courts? Would not that course relieve us of a difficulty which must involve the Government in a very great outlay of money? for this precedent once established, as has already been stated, involves millions of dollars. I would not say that the Government should not respond and pay every dollar that is lawfully due, but certainly the courts, it seems to me, would be the proper tribunal to determine the facts in these cases.

Mr. HOWE. Now, I have to say that I think the Senator from Illinois is sensible in that conclusion; it is mine exactly. But the misfortune is that Congress believes right the other way, and you passed an act in 1864 excluding the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims from every one of these cases in express terms. The court cannot touch one of them. That is the decision of Congress, against my judgment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It was intended to deny the right.

Mr. HOWE. Not at all. In my judgment it was intended to keep this jurisdiction to yourself because you meant to have it exercised, I suppose, more religiously than it could be exercised in any court. I know of no other reason.

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. POMEROY] the other day took some part in this debate, and he prefaced his remarks, I remember, by saying that he never liked to mingle in debate unless he knew something about the subject; but this he happened to know something about. He will pardon me for saying that the questions he went on to put indicated rather what he did not know than what he did, for he went on to ask why we did not have a general bill to provide for all the cases in Decatur, Alabama; and he informed us that he understood there were something like a thousand of them just like this, and he asked, why not provide for them? He wanted to know if Miss Murphey was any better than all the rest of the people down there in Decatur. Now let me say to my friend from Kansas, in all sincerity, that I do not know that Miss Murphey is a whit better than any of the rest of the people in Decatur, but there are several reasons why we have not put the rest of the cases from Decatur into this bill. One is that I had not heard of any other cases from Decatur, and I never report bills here in favor of people that I have not heard of. Another reason is that I could not very well get up an omnibus bill here to provide for all the claims in the rebel country; and I suppose if we had included all from Decatur, the thousand from Decatur that the Senator spoke of, he would not have been satisfied; he would have wanted to know why all of the rebels in all other towns were not also included.

Sir, the only way in which we can exercise this jurisdiction with any sort of safety is to wait until people make their claims and then hear the proofs in support of those individual claims, and report each case by itself, and let each case stand upon its merits and upon the proof in support of its merits. I hope my friend from Kansas will consider that a sufficient apology for not holding back Miss Murphey until all of his friends from Decatur had filed their claims here and had substantiated them by proof. I think—and such I believe was the opinion of the Committee on Claims—that when one friend of the Government had presented his claim and substantiated it by proof which established, in our judgments, the right to an appropriation, we had no business to tell that claimant "It is all right; you are to have your money; but we cannot pay it until everybody else who has as good a claim as yourself comes forward and satisfies us of the justice of it."

Sir, I was commenting a little time ago upon the amount of expenditures that this principle, if agreed to, would probably involve us in. I have cited you to the past experience of the Committee on Claims upon this point. In 1864 you passed an act authorizing the commissary department to audit and allow claims up to $500 for subsistence stores taken with or without vouchers and not paid for, but you excluded them from those regions down there; and you authorized the quartermaster's department to audit and allow all claims for quartermaster's stores up to $500. It was generally supposed that these two little provisions would involve us in the expenditure of untold millions of money; but the recent report from the War Office shows us that the whole amount of claims preferred to the commissary department has been less than three million dollars, and that on that three millions they have allowed only about five hundred thousand dollars in all the time since that act passed, and they have rejected all the rest except about six hundred thousand dollars, which is yet unadjusted; and although I do not remember the figures as to the quartermaster's department, they are somewhat larger than those, but I think that the amount that has been disbursed by the quartermaster's department is only about two million dollars.

Mr. President, I discredit the idea that this Government plundered from our friends during the rebellion and in the rebel districts more than we have appropriated by national legislation in support of the war. I do not believe any such thing. Undoubtedly we took some property that belonged to our friends. We have had evidence of that in two or three cases already. I think it is the part of wisdom, and I think it is the part of honesty, to pay such claims. But if the Senate says otherwise, if it is the deliberate judgment of Congress that you cannot afford to pay or will not pay these claims, I only ask you to say so; and I give you my word that so far as I am concerned in the administration of the business before that committee I will abide by your decisions; there shall be no other claim involving this principle reported from that committee with my consent. I will say, however, upon that point, that I do not believe there are ten Senators on this floor who, if you were to settle the principle to-day that you would not pay these claims, would not ask to have it within a year from this time unsettled and ripped up. That is my belief; I may be mistaken about it. However, I ask to have the question settled, and settled without further delay, because if you say these claims shall not be paid then we shall be relieved from the labor of examining other cases pending before the committee, and which involve this principle.

Mr. POMEROY. The Senator from Wisconsin has seen fit to reply to some feeble remarks which I made the other day.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the Senator from Kansas give way for a motion to adjourn?

Mr. POMEROY. I will make that motion myself in a few minutes if the Senator desires to adjourn. I only wanted to say, in a single word, that I made those remarks in great innocence, thinking the Senator from Wisconsin himself made out a case against his bill. He said the case of Miss Murphey grew out of an order issued by the commanding general to vacate the town of Decatur, and in support of that read the order, if I recollect aright, that every citizen of Decatur should vacate his premises by a given day because they were wanted by the military authorities; and Miss Murphey vacated with all the other citizens. That suggested to me a very innocent, as I thought, inquiry why, if this claim arose under that order, she alone was to be compensated. I was certainly green enough to suppose that if we undertook to make compensation to one loyal citizen in Decatur suffering under one order we should extend it to other loyal citizens in the same town suffering under the same order. But the Senator says he has not heard of any other case. If there were no others that fact might have been stated in his report, and I should not have meddled with it.

For myself, I can hardly see why the Government should not compensate the losses of an individual who was faithful to it, who acknowledged that he owed it supreme allegiance, and to whom the Government, as a consequence, owed protection, and a loss occurred because it did not protect him. On the theory upon which we prosecuted this war, that it was not a rebellion of States but only of individuals, of course the individual is not committed to the condition of his State, because the State assumes no authority in the matter. What has been urged against this class of claims is that the claimants followed the fortunes of their State, and that the rebellion of the State committed the citizen to rebellion. But that was not the theory upon which Mr. Lincoln and those who were early in proclamations conducted the war. It was that the people and not the States had gone into rebellion. If the State as an organized political body did not go into the rebellion it did not commit its citizens, and only the individuals who went in should be made to suffer. I know nothing about this case of Miss Murphey. I only say that I want equal, even, exact justice dealt out to loyal citizens in Decatur, and if one hundred of them suffered under the same order I want them all compensated if one is.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I have—

Mr. HOWARD. With permission of the Senator from New Jersey, I ask whether he will not yield to a motion to adjourn?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I have a few remarks to make on this subject; but I have no disposition, if the Senate wish to adjourn, to proceed now.

Mr. HOWARD. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I simply wish to say that I do not expect to be here on Monday. I do not know whether it is expected that there will be a quorum here on Monday or not. If so, I should like the subject laid over until we come together again.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is no danger of anybody being here on Monday.

Mr. HOWE. It is only a little past two o'clock, and I think the Senate ought to settle this question this afternoon.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is Saturday afternoon; and this is an important question.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President—

Mr. HOWE. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Before the question is put I ask the indulgence of the Senate to be allowed to make a remark. I think there should be some understanding that no general business shall be transacted on Monday beyond that of the morning hour. As many of our members have already gone and others are about to leave, I hope before we adjourn to-day, it will be understood that no general business shall be taken up on Monday; that the morning hour will be gone through with.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is already understood. There will be no quorum here on Monday.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Let it be understood that the morning hour will be gone through with; and I believe there is a death to be announced that day. ["Yes."] Then members who desire to go home can go with the assurance that no important business will be called up on that day.

The yeas and nays being taken, resulted—yeas 24, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cameron, Chandler, Cole, Drake, Edmunds, Fessenden, Harlan, Harris, Howard, Kellogg, McCreery, Morgan, Norton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Ramsey, Rice, Sherman, Stewart, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Vickers, and Williams—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Corbett, Davis, Dixon, Ferry, Fowler, Howe, Morrill of Vermont, Nye, Osborn, Pool, Ross, Spencer, Sprague, Sumner, Thayer, Wade, Warner, Whyte, and Wiley—19.

ABSENT—Messrs. Abbott, Anthony, Bayard, Cat-tell, Conkling, Conness, Cragin, Doolittle, Freling-huysen, Grimes, Henderson, Hendricks, McDonald, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Pomeroy, Robertson, Sanisbury, Sawyer, Tipton, Welch, Wilson, and Yates—28.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

IN SENATE.

Monday, December 21, 1868.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. Gray, D. D.

The Journal of Saturday last was read and approved.

CONTINGENT FUND OF THE SENATE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Senate, communicating, in obedience to law, a detailed statement of the payments from the contingent fund of the Senate for the year ending December 6, 1868; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SUMNER. I present a petition from a mass meeting of Republican citizens of the town of Norfolk, which was held some time during July. The petition was sent to me shortly afterward, but I have had no occasion to present it until now. It sets forth that a bill was introduced in the Senate of the United States by me some time in July, 1867, to strike the word "white" from the naturalization laws, and that that matter was afterward referred to the Judiciary Committee of the Senate. It then sets forth that there are actually persons of foreign birth, of African descent, who have rendered the country efficient service during the rebellion, and that they have no other way of becoming citizens except by the process of naturalization. After setting forth those facts the petition proceeds to ask that Congress would pass the bill introduced by me, or some similar bill, so as to strike the word "white" out of the naturalization laws of the United States.

In presenting this petition I desire to say, that if I remember rightly the bill introduced by me was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, when I was pressing its passage, by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.] He led me to suppose at the time that the bill would shortly be reported back from the committee and put on its passage. It has not been reported back, and, so far as I know, is now slumbering among the papers of the committee. I hope that it may be reported back and put upon its passage. I believe that our naturalization laws are the only laws which now contain the word "white," and I think that word ought to be expunged from them. I ask the reference of this petition to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to say, in reply to what the honorable Senator from Massachusetts has said, that I believe he is correct in saying that the bill to which he alludes was referred to that committee on my motion. I wish to assure him that the fact that it has not been reported—that is, in its principle; I do not say in its form—is not imputable to me; nor, under the circumstances, do I think it is to the committee. That committee has been overwhelmed with labor connected with reconstructions and that sort of business which has precluded it from keeping up with its Calendar.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope, however, as the bill is short, that the committee will call it up and proceed with its consideration.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And make short work of it.

Mr. SUMNER. Yes, make short work of it. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SUMNER. I also present the memorial of the Universal Peace Union, an elaborate document in behalf of the Indians. This document contains a very complete argument in favor of justice to the Indians. I ask its reference to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

It was so referred.

Mr. SUMNER. I also present a petition from citizens of Kansas living on lands known as the Osage lands, in which they earnestly pray Congress that a treaty with reference to those lands may be ratified only so far as to place the title of the land in the United States, so that it may be disposed of to actual settlers as other public lands are. I ask the reference of this petition to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

It was so referred.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I present the petition of Samuel W. Porter and fifty other citizens of Springfield, Vermont, praying that Congress will—

First. Pass the civil service bill of Hon. THOMAS A. JENCKES.

Second. Complete and pass the new tax bill, reducing taxation wherever possible.

Third. Reduce expenses in all Departments, and decrease the proportion of costly officers in the Army and Navy.

Fourth. Put all Indian affairs in charge of the War Department, to save cost and stop fraud.

Fifth. Let lands required by treaty from the Indians be sold at public land offices, and not in large tracts to speculators.

Sixth. Grant no subsidies in money or bonds to railroads.

Seventh. Stop large and useless appropriations for custom-houses and hospitals.

Eighth. Adopt such measures as in your wisdom you deem best to turn the balance of trade in our favor, that our coin may be left at home as a means of resuming specie payments.

I ask the reference of this petition to the Committee on Finance.

It was so referred.

Mr. RAMSEY presented a petition of citizens of Minnesota, praying for the establishment of a mail route from Glenwood to Chippewa City, by way of Isaac Thorson's, of Hazel Lake, Six Mile Timber, Big Bend, and Chippewa Crossing; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. WILSON presented a memorial of inmates of the Soldiers' Home, located at Washington, District of Columbia, praying for the consolidation of that home with the national homes at Dayton, Ohio, Milwaukee, Wisconsin, and Augusta, Maine; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. OSBORN presented the petition of James D. Green, of Florida, asking for pay for services in the Army of the United States as captain of cavalry from March, 1864, to April, 1865; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. THAYER presented the petition of Henry C. Whitney, in behalf of the leading citizens of southern Kansas and of the half-breed Osages, against the ratification of the Osage treaty, except on such terms as will entirely exclude monopolists; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CORBETT presented a resolution of the Legislative Assembly of Oregon, in favor of a commission to investigate and take proof as to the losses sustained by citizens of Oregon on account of Indian depredations; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of Oregon, relating to the railroad land grant from the Central Pacific railroad, in California, to Portland, Oregon; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CAMERON presented a petition of citizens of Pennsylvania, praying for the repeal of so much of sections seventy-eight and ninety-four of the act entitled "An act imposing taxes on distilled spirits and tobacco, and for other purposes," as relate to the tax on tobacco, snuff, and cigars manufactured after the passage of that act, and for other amendments of that law; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HARRIS presented the petition of George F. Brott, praying for compensation for the value of the model barge Brott and Davis, impressed into the military service of the United States and lost; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. RAMSEY, it was Ordered, That the petition of the postmaster at Meadville and others, citizens of Pennsylvania, be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS.

Mr. MORGAN. I am instructed by the Committee on the Library to present the report of the Librarian to Congress, showing the condition of the Library during the year ending December 1, 1868, and to offer the following resolution on the subject:

Resolved, That the annual report of the Librarian of Congress, showing the condition of the Library during the year ending December 1, 1868, be printed for the information of the Senate, with three hundred additional copies for the use of the Library.

I ask for the present consideration of the resolution. It is precisely like the one that was adopted last year, and I think there is no objection to it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That resolution must go to the Committee on Printing, under the rules.

Mr. MORGAN. I hope it will not be referred, because that would carry it over until January, and it ought to be disposed of now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can be done by unanimous consent. Is there any objection?

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLINTON LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 700) for the relief of Joseph Moorehead.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 1555) to amend an act entitled "An act imposing taxes on distilled spirits and tobacco, and for other purposes," approved July 20, 1868; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1556) to relieve certain persons of all political disabilities imposed by the fourteenth article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 719) relating to the judges of the Supreme Court; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 720) to reorganize and increase the efficiency of the medical department of the Navy; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ROSS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 721) to establish certain post routes in the State of Kansas; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

LIGHT-HOUSES ON THE PACIFIC COAST.

Mr. CORBETT. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President direct the Secretary of the Treasury to detail an officer to select such prominent points upon the coasts of Oregon, Washington Territory, and Alaska, as in his judgment may be necessary for light-house purposes, in view of the future commercial necessity of the Pacific coast, and to reserve the same for exclusive use of the United States.

I ask for the present consideration of this resolution. It is a matter of great importance that such points should be set aside before they are taken up by settlers.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is it a resolution of inquiry?

Mr. CORBETT. It is a Senate resolution requesting the President to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to detail an officer for the purpose mentioned.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How can the Senate direct that?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon asks for the present consideration of the resolution. It requires unanimous consent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It was, I think, generally understood on Saturday that we should not do any business to-day except the mere introduction of petitions, bills, and things of that kind, and therefore, without the slightest objection to or knowledge of the proposition of the Senator from Oregon, I think it is not right toward those who are absent upon that understanding, and who may be interested in everything that we take up, that we should take any action to-day. Upon that ground I object.

Mr. POMEROY. There are valuable spots on the Pacific coast that ought to be taken possession of for light-house purposes before they are squatted upon.

Mr. EDMUNDS. They will not be squatted upon before the 1st of January.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the resolution goes over, under the rule.

THE METRIC SYSTEM.

Mr. SUMNER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to report to the Senate what has been done in pursuance of joint resolution of July 27, 1866, authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Treasury to furnish to each State one set of the standard weights and measures of the metric system for the use of the States, respectively.

Mr. SUMNER also submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be requested to report to the Senate what has been done in pursuance of the act of July 27, 1866, authorizing and directing the Postmaster General to furnish to certain post offices postal balances denominated in grams of the metric system.

COMMITTEE ON THE PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. RICE. I desire to call up the resolution that I submitted a few days ago, to add two members to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad. I then stated the reason for it to be that in the organization of that committee the South was not represented. The southern States are now represented here, and have some important bills before that committee that need their attention, and I know of no very good reason for not adding some representatives from the southern States to that committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to take up the resolution indicated by him. It will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Pacific Railroad be increased by adding two members thereto.

Mr. EDMUNDS. At the risk of making myself obnoxious I must, on the understanding we had on Saturday, object to that resolution. It is certainly a matter of importance. I have not the least objection to the proposition; I wish the Senator from Arkansas to understand; but a great many members went away on Saturday with the explicit understanding, as I understood it, that nothing but the routine business of the morning hour, the introduction of petitions and bills, should be done to-day.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not know anything about such an understanding on Saturday. I never heard of it, and I was here all day Saturday.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I had such an understanding, and it so appears in the Globe.

Mr. POMEROY. I am not a party to any such understanding.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know that you are.

Mr. RICE. At the suggestion of the honorable Senator from Vermont I allowed this resolution to lie over on two different occasions, waiting for the arrival of the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. HOWARD,] the chairman of the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and it was agreed between the chairman and myself that it should be taken up this morning, and I have called it up in obedience to that understanding.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If that was the understanding I withdraw my objection, and let the chairman of the committee take the responsibility as to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No objection being made, the resolution is before the Senate, and the question is on agreeing to it.

Mr. WARNER. I think a glance at the constitution of the committee, as printed, will satisfy every Senator of the propriety of adding two additional members to it. It will be seen that the committee is constituted entirely of Senators from one section of the country. A large section of the country which is now represented on this floor has a very vital interest in this subject of the Pacific railroad, and it is but just and right that their interests should be regarded in the constitution of such an important committee.

Mr. HOWARD. Of course it is a matter, perhaps, of no great importance to the present members of that committee whether their number shall be increased or not. I rise merely to make a statement. That committee is one of the standing committees of the Senate, and now consists of nine members, which is the greatest number belonging to any one of the standing committees of the Senate; the other standing committees consisting of seven or five members. The question appears to be rather one of utility than otherwise. It is for the Senate to determine whether the business that properly belongs to that committee will probably be expedited by increasing the number from nine to eleven. We all know that a committee may be too numerous as well as too few. I have no further remark upon the subject to make except this, that I fear the increase of the number would render the committee too unwieldy and perhaps less efficient than it is already. It is for the Senate, however, to determine the question.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, in my judgment the Committee on the Pacific Railroad ought to be increased during this session by the addition of two members. The reason given by the Senators from Arkansas and Alabama, that the southern States are not represented on this committee and that they have interests in the Pacific railroad, is conclusive to my mind that they should be represented on the committee, especially as the committee is the representative mainly of local interests. The present constitution of the committee is manifestly unjust, because it excludes the interest represented by them from consideration by the committee. My own impression, however, is that this increase ought not to be of a permanent character, and I think if the Senator will modify his resolution so as to allow the increase only for this session there will be but little objection to it. At the next session the committees will naturally be reorganized. Perhaps it could not be done now at the beginning of this session. At the next session the committee by reorganization might be reduced. Some of the present members will not be members of the next Congress, and there will be no difficulty, probably, in reducing the number of the present Pacific Railroad Committee to nine members and yet giving every section of the country a fair representation upon it. Probably by confining the increase to this session it will compel the reorganization of the Pacific Railroad Committee, which I think ought to be done, at the next session.

Mr. RICE. I have no objection to that modification.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That modification will be made.

Mr. CORBETT. I am in favor of the increase of this committee to eleven members, and when such an increase is made I think the southern States ought to be represented on the committee, and also the northern portion of the Pacific coast. There is no one upon that committee representing the interest of the Northern Pacific railroad upon the Pacific coast, its termination; and I trust that when the committee is increased the South will be represented, and also the northern portion of that section of the country which I have the honor in part to represent.

Mr. WILSON. In reply to the Senator from Oregon I wish to say that it seems to me that section of the country is pretty well represented on this committee. The chairman of the committee is the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. HOWARD,] then I find on the committee Mr. SHERMAN from Ohio, Mr. CONNESS from California, Mr. RAMSEY from Minnesota, Mr. STEWART from Nevada, Mr. HARLAN from Iowa, and Mr. DRAKE from Missouri. I should think that part of the world was pretty well represented on this committee now.

Mr. CORBETT. I spoke only of the Northern Pacific road, which is located some seven hundred and fifty or eight hundred miles north of San Francisco. The present representatives of the Pacific coast on the committee is upon the Central road as now constructed—Nevada and California—but Oregon, Washington Territory, Puget sound, and that portion of the country is not represented at all upon the committee.

Mr. WILSON. I thought the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. RAMSEY] was on the line of that road, and a faithful representative of the interests of that part of the country.

Mr. CORBETT. It may be that upon the Atlantic coast the northern section of the country is represented. I only speak of the northern portion of the Pacific coast, which is interested in having a large section of country there developed, and which has never had any representation upon that committee. We have a large country there. It is settled up by people who went to that country in 1835 and 1838, and we have been blocked up there and have not had any communication with the eastern States. Those people who settled there early were the means of our acquiring that large extent of country, as large as all the New England States and New York, Pennsylvania, and Ohio combined, by their industry and energy, crossing the mountains and settling in that country, which was but little known and but little developed. They have been the means of our acquiring a vast extent of country which at one time was likely to be ceded by us to the English Government. The heroism of the early settlers there has been the chief means of our acquiring that territory. I desire that that people should have a representation upon this committee. I am in favor of the development of this vast country and every portion of it by such internal improvements as the Government may think it best to grant. I only ask that the people on the northern Pacific coast may have a representation on this committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read as modified.

The Chief Clerk read it, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Pacific Railroad be increased by adding thereto two members; this addition not to extend beyond the present session.

Mr. WILSON. There are six Senators from the Pacific coast, and two of them are on this committee already. Does the Senator from Oregon propose to put another upon it?

Mr. CORBETT. The proposition now before us is to add two more members to the committee. As I understand the Senator from California [Mr. CONNESS] represents the Southern Pacific railroad as well as the Central, but the northern section of that country has no representation upon the committee, and I thought it would be nothing more than just that one member from that section of the country should be placed upon it until the reorganization of the committee, when I am in hopes that this matter will be remedied. One member of that committee will not be a member of the next Congress.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, here is a committee consisting of nine members. Five of them represent States west of the Mississippi river, and four of them represent States east of that stream. There is something in this country east of the Mississippi river. I do not know that there is anything east of the Alleghany mountains, but there is something east of the Mississippi. Now, sir, if we are to add to this committee, and I do not know but that it would be right to do so, I think the two Senators placed upon it temporarily for this session should be taken from the southern section of the country, which is not represented upon the committee. I think that two members from the Pacific coast on this committee will do very well for that section, and as we have a good member of the committee who understands the subject very well, living on the line of the Northern Pacific railroad, I think that is a fair representation of that interest. Then, when we reconstruct this committee next year, I think it would be very well to scatter the location of the committee over the whole country, so as to make it represent the whole Union, and not locate it quite all on the Pacific coast, or a majority of it west of the Mississippi river. I think we ought to understand that there is something east of that river.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, I am quite disposed to reject the idea of localities in the appointment of committees in the Senate. I think, on the contrary, we ought to represent the opinions of the Senate and of the country. This subject of the Pacific railroad involves great and controverted questions. Some portion of the Senate and of the country believe that we ought to continue the policy inaugurated by the first railroad bill, and not only give lands, but subsidies, where ever they are demanded. Another portion of the Senate believe that this is reckless legislation, and that we have already gone as far as we ought to go in that direction, and have paid twice as much as it ought to have cost to accomplish what we wish to accomplish by the present legislation already on the statute-books. There is another portion of the Senate and of the country who believe that we ought to pursue this business of opening communications with the Pacific coast with some degree of economy, to ascertain what we have already done, and, if we do anything more, that we shall do it properly, in the right places, and for the least possible expenditure. In my judgment, the localities of the representatives of the country upon this committee are wholly unimportant; but it is important that we shall give all these various shades of sentiment in the Senate and in the country a fair representation on that committee. That is all that I ask for as a member of the Senate.

Mr. CORBETT. I do not desire anything more than a fair representation upon that committee. Senators should remember that there is a vast country bordering there upon the northern Pacific coast, although it consists of but one State and one Territory. We should also remember that the distance from San Francisco to Puget sound and that section of country is greater than the distance from New York to New Orleans. It is a distance of some seven hundred or eight hundred miles. Not only that, but we have a vast country beyond there which will eventually be opened up by the Northern Pacific railroad. I think it is important that there should be a member of the committee from that section of the country who can give information as to the importance of the country and the importance of developing it to the committee. If there is no representative from that section upon the committee the committee in discussing these questions can have no information in regard to it. During the discussion of railroad bills it is frequently necessary to refer to a member of the committee the question as to the extent of the country and the importance of such a road.

Now, sir, I submit, in all candor to the Senate, that it is important that a member should be placed upon that committee to represent that country which is some eight or nine hundred miles north of the present line of the Pacific road, and to explain to the committee the necessity and importance of either establishing a branch road to that country or a northern Pacific road. I have not suggested any amendment to the resolution, but merely stated that I thought that the northern Pacific coast ought to be represented upon that committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution, as modified.

The resolution, as modified, was adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. How shall the additional members of the committee be appointed?

Mr. RICE. If it be in order I move that the President pro tempore of the Senate appoint the additional members of the committee. By unanimous consent I believe that can be done.

The motion was agreed to.

INDIAN SUPERINTENDENTS AND AGENTS.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to report to the Senate the names of the Indian superintendents and agents, and whether any, and if so, which of said superintendents and agents are absent from their posts.

EXAMINATION OF PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. THAYER. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to instruct the same special commissioners who have examined the Union Pacific railroad west of Omaha and the Union Pacific railroad, eastern division, to complete the examination of all the Pacific railroads as far as constructed under the same instructions under which examinations have already been made by them, and report the amounts necessary to complete said roads according to the standard of a first-class railroad, as required by law.

Mr. STEWART. I object to the present consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, it lies over under the rule.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD REPORTS.

Mr. HOWARD submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to communicate to the Senate the reports of the Union Pacific Railroad Company and its branches, as requested by the Senate resolution of the 3d of July last.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned, to meet on the 5th of January next.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, December 21, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock m., Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, occupying the Chair as Speaker pro tempore.

The Journal of Friday last was read and approved.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 1556) to relieve certain persons of all political disabilities imposed by the fourteenth article of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States; and

An act (H. R. No. 1555) to amend an act entitled "An act imposing taxes on distilled spirits and tobacco, and for other purposes," approved July 20, 1868.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, one of its clerks, announced that that body had passed a bill and joint resolution of the following titles; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

An act (S. No. 711) relating to the Metropolitan Railroad Company; and

A joint resolution (S. No. 178) tendering sympathy to the people of Spain.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President, by Mr. WILLIAM G. MOORE, his Private Secretary, informed the House that he had approved and signed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 375) donating condemned cannon for the erection of a monument to Major General Kearny.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask unanimous consent to introduce some bills.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would state to the gentleman from Illinois that is not in his power to receive any bills to-day. It was the order of the House that no business whatever should be transacted to-day except to receive a report from the Committee on Retrenchment.

Mr. CULLOM. I did not understand that such was the order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That was the order of the House.

Mr. SPALDING. I ask to have the order read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would state to the gentleman from Ohio that it is a matter of record on the Journal. The Journal is in the Clerk's office, but will be sent for if the gentleman from Ohio desires it.

Mr. SPALDING. I understood the Chair to say that no business can be transacted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is the order of the House made on Wednesday.

Mr. MULLINS. It was my understanding clearly that no business was to be done to-day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That was the order of the House, but, after that order was made, by unanimous consent, the gentleman from New York [Mr. VAN WYCK] was authorized to make a report to be recommitment and printed.

Mr. CULLOM. I understand that that order was proposed; but failed to be adopted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It was adopted.

Mr. McKEE. I merely want to make one remark in reference to the order of the House. I do not wish, of course, to differ from the Speaker pro tempore, but in regard to that agreement on Thursday last I remember very distinctly that I myself objected to the general consent asked for, and insisted upon that objection. I was appealed to by a dozen gentlemen around me to withdraw it, and declined to do so. I was very much astonished on the succeeding morning to find it entered on the Journal that the order had been made. It was stated in all the reports in the public journals and in the Associated Press dispatches that objection was made, and I want to state now that I objected at the time and refused to withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is a matter about which the Chair has no knowledge except from the Journal. The Chair is informed that the Speaker understood the gentleman from Kentucky to withdraw his objection, and so announced; and the order was entered on the Journal, and the Journal was not corrected.

Mr. McKEE. That is true. I notified the Speaker, however, on the following morning that I intended to rise and make the correction, but the announcement of the death of Mr. Stevens prevented me from doing so. I merely make this statement in justification of myself.

WHISKY FRAUDS.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Under the unanimous consent given in the House on Friday last I present a report from the Committee on Retrenchment, and move that it be recommitment to the committee and ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VAN WYCK. As the report contains what I intended hereafter to embody in a speech, I ask that it be printed in the Globe.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair cannot entertain that motion. It would involve a vote of the House, and would be business.

Mr. GETZ. If there is to be no further business transacted I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at twelve o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the House, in accordance with the concurrent resolution, adjourned until Tuesday, January 5, 1869.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I offer the petition of Hungarians, citizens of the United States, praying for the establishment of a United States consulate general at Buda-Pesth. In this petition they set forth reasons for our having a consul general there. The reasons certainly are very strong, and refer to the present condition of Hungary and the importance of opening business relations with Hungary. I will say, in presenting the petition, that I have my doubts whether there is an occasion for what the petitioners ask for—a consul general; but I do think that we ought to have a consul there. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER presented the petition of professors and students of Lincoln University, Oxford, Pennsylvania, praying for an amendment to the Constitution which will secure to all citizens equal political rights; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the petition of the University of Virginia, praying for the remission of duties on certain apparatus, &c., for which the university has sent to Europe; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

I present also a petition from various citizens of the United States, in which they ask that Congress will pass the civil service bill, a new tax law, reduce the expenses in all departments, and decrease the proportion of costly officers in the Army and Navy; and also that the Indian Bureau be put under the War Department; that all lands acquired by treaties from the Indians may be sold at public land offices; that no more subsidies be granted to railroads; to stop the useless appropriations for custom-houses and hospitals; for the adoption of such measures as in the wisdom of Congress may be deemed just. This petition seems appropriate enough to go to any of the committees; I move that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COLE presented a memorial of citizens of California, praying that there may be no further legislation in relation to the public lands in township seven, south of range one, west of the Mount Diablo meridian in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I present a joint resolution, passed by the Legislature of the State of Vermont, on the subject of public lands; which I ask may be read and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Joint resolution concerning grants of the public lands of the United States.

Whereas the Government of the United States has from time to time granted large tracts of valuable land to various and almost all of the western and southern States, for the purposes of aiding education or internal improvements in those States; and whereas the State of Vermont, although at all times fully and completely doing her duty to the United States, has in only one instance been the recipient of such bounty and favor from the United States; Therefore Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress are hereby requested to use their best endeavors to procure from the Government of the United States such grants of unappropriated public lands, for the aid and advancement of education and for the promotion of internal improvements in the State of Vermont, as will be just and equitable.

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and is hereby, directed to transmit an authenticated copy of these resolutions to each Senator and Representative for Vermont in the Congress of the United States.

AMNESTY PROCLAMATION.

Mr. FERRY. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to transmit to the Senate a copy of any proclamation of amnesty made by him since the last adjournment of Congress; and also to communicate to the Senate by what authority of law the same was made.

Mr. President, in introducing this resolution, I wish to say that while I approve the act of amnesty which purports to have been made by the recent proclamation of the President of the United States, I at the same time entertain serious doubts as to the authority of the executive department to make such proclamation of general amnesty; and in order that a precedent may not be made which hereafter shall be unsafe, and that an authoritative exposition of the law relative to proclamations of general amnesty in our system may be made for the future guidance of the Government, I desire to obtain a copy of the proclamation and a statement of the authority upon which it has been made by the Executive, for the purpose of referring the document to the Judiciary Committee and receiving a report thereon. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

By unanimous consent the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. HOWARD. I was about to inquire of the Senator from Connecticut whether the proclamation to which his resolution refers does or does not rest upon the confiscation act, so called, of 1862? If so, I suppose that has been repealed.

Mr. FERRY. I have a copy of the proclamation before me, which purports to proclaim
